INTRODUCTION

ANALYSES of the Republic abound.^a The object of this sketch is not to follow all the windings of its ideas, but to indicate sufficiently their literary framework and setting. Socrates speaks in the first person, as in the Charmides and the Lysis. He relates to Critias, Timaeus, Hermocrates, and an unnamed fourth person, as we learn from the introduction of the Timaeus, a conversation which took place "yesterday" at the Peiraeus. The narrative falls on the day of the Lesser Panathenaea, and its scene, like that of the Timaeus, Proclus affirms to be the city or the Acropolis, a more suitable place, he thinks, for the quieter theme and the fit audience but few than the noisy seaport, apt symbol of Socrates' contention with the sophists.^b

The Timaeus, composed some time later than the Republic, is by an afterthought represented as its ✓ sequel. And the Republic, Timaeus, and unfinished Critias constitute the first of the "trilogies" in which Aristophanes of Byzantium arranged the Platonic dialogues.^a The Timaeus accordingly opens with a brief recapitulation of the main political and social features of the Republic. But nothing can be inferred from the variations of this slight summary.^b

The dramatic date of the dialogue is plausibly assigned by Boeckh^c to the year 411 or 410.^d Proof is impossible because Plato admits anachronisms in his dramas.^e

Socrates tells how he went down to the Peiraeus to attend the new festival of the Thracian Artemis, Bendis,^f and, turning homewards, was detained by ^b Proclus tries to show that the points selected for emphasis are those which prefigure the constitution and government of the universe by the Creator (In Tim. 17 E-F). His reasoning is differently presented but hardly more fantastic than that of modern critics who endeavour to determine by this means the original design or order of publication of the parts of the Republic. ^f The religion of Bendis may have been known at Athens as early as Cratinus's Thraittai (443 B.C.), Kock, Fragmenta, i. 34. Mommsen, Feste der Stadt Athen, p. 490, cites inscriptions to prove its establishment in Attica as early as 429-428 B.C. But he thinks Plato's "inasmuch as this was the first celebration" may refer to special ceremonies first instituted circa 411 B.C.

a group of friends who took him to the house of Polemarchus, brother of the orator Lysias.^a A goodly company was assembled there, Lysias and a younger brother Euthydemus—yea, and Thrasy-machus of Chalcedon,^b Charmantides of the deme Paiania,^c Cleitophon,^d and conspicuous among them the venerable Cephalus, crowned from a recent sacrifice and a prefiguring type of the happy old age of the just man.^e A conversation springs up which Socrates guides to an inquiry into the definition and nature of justice (330 D, 331 C, 332 B) and to the conclusion that the conventional Greek formula, "Help your friends and harm your enemies," cannot be right (335 E-336 A), since it is not the function (ἔργον, 335 D) of the good man to do evil to any. The sophist

^a See Lysias in any classical dictionary. He returned to Athens from Thurii circa 412 B.C. Polemarchus was the older brother. He was a student of philosophy (Phaedr. 257 B). Whether he lived with Cephalus or Cephalus with him cannot be inferred with certainty. Lysias perhaps had a separate house at the Peiraeus (cf. Phaedr. 227 B). The family owned three houses in 404 B.C. (Lysias, Or. 12. 18), and Blass (Attische Beredsamkeit, i. p. 347) infers from Lysias, 12. 16 that Polemarchus resided at Athens. Lysias takes no part in the conversation. He was no philosopher (Phaedr. 257 B).

^d Apparently a partisan of Thrasy-machus. His name is given to a short, probably spurious, dialogue, of which the main thought is that Socrates, though excellent in exhortation or protreptic, is totally lacking in a positive and coherent philosophy. Grote and others have conjectured it to be a discarded introduction to the Republic.

INTRODUCTION

Thrasymachus, intervening brutally (336 B), affirms the immoralist thesis that justice is only the advantage of the (politically) stronger, and with humorous dramatic touches of character-portrayal is finally silenced (350 c-d), much as Callicles is refuted in the Gorgias. The conclusion, in the manner of the minor dialogues, is that Socrates knows nothing (354 c). For since he does not know what justice is, he cannot a fortiori determine the larger question raised by Thrasymachus's later contention (352 D), whether the just life or the unjust life is the happier.

Either the first half or the whole of this book detached would be a plausible companion to such dialogues as the Charmides and Laches, which deal in similar manner with two other cardinal virtues, temperance and bravery. It is an easy but idle and unverifiable conjecture that it was in Plato's original intention composed as a separate work, perhaps a discarded sketch for the Gorgias, and only by an afterthought became an introduction for the Republic.^a It is now an excellent introduction and not, in view of the extent of the Republic, disproportionate in length. That is all we know or can know.

The second book opens with what Mill describes as a "monument of the essential fairness of Plato's mind"^b—a powerful restatement of the theory of Thrasymachus by the brothers of Plato, Glaucon and Adeimantus. They are not content with the dialectic that reduced Thrasymachus to silence (358 B). They demand a demonstration which will convince the youth hesitating at the cross-roads of virtue and vice (365 A-B)^a that it is really and intrinsically better to be than to seem just.^b

It is Plato's method always to restate a satirized and controverted doctrine in its most plausible form before proceeding to a definitive refutation.^c As he himself says in the Phaedrus (272 c), "it is right to give the wolf too a hearing."

It is also characteristic of Plato that he prefers to put the strongest statement of the sophistic, immoralist, Machiavellian, Hobbesian, Nietzschean political ethics in the mouths of speakers who are themselves on the side of the angels.^d There is this historical justification of the procedure, that there exists not a shred of evidence that any contemporary or predecessor of Plato could state any of their theories which he assailed as well, as fully, as coherently, as systematically, as he has done it for them.

In response to the challenge of Glaucon and Adeimantus, Socrates proposes to study the nature of justice and injustice writ large in the larger organism of the state, and to test the conceptions so won by their application to the individual also (368 E, 369 A). Plato, though he freely employs metaphor, symbolism, and myth, never bases his argument on them.^a The figurative language here, as elsewhere, serves as a transition to, a framework for, an illustration of, the argument. Man is a social and political animal, and nothing but abstract dialectics can come of the attempt to isolate his psychology and ethics from the political and social environment that shapes them.^b The question whether the main subject of the Republic is justice or the state is, as Proclus already in effect said, a logomachy.^c The construction of an ideal state was a necessary part of Plato's design, and actually occupies the larger part of the Republic. But it is, as he repeatedly tells us, logically subordinated to the proof that the just is the happy life.^d

It is idle to object that it is not true and cannot be proved that righteousness is verifiably happiness. The question still interests humanity, and Plato's discussion of it, whether it does or does not amount to a demonstration, still remains the most instructive and suggestive treatment of the theme in all literature.

There is little profit also in scrutinizing too curiously the unity or lack of unity of design in the Republic, the scale and proportion of the various topics introduced, the justification and relevance of what may seem to some modern readers disproportionate digressions. The rigid, undeviating logic which Poe postulates for the short story or poem has no application to the large-scale masterpieces of literature as we actually find them. And it is the height of naïveté for philological critics who have never themselves composed any work of literary art to schoolmaster such creations by their own a priori canons of the logic and architectonic unity of composition. Such speculations have made wild work of Homeric criticism. They have been applied to Demosthenes On the Crown and Virgil's Aeneid. Their employment either in criticism of the Republic or in support of unverifiable hypotheses about the order of composition of its different books is sufficiently disposed of by the common sense of the passages which I have quoted below.^a For the reader who intelligently follows the Goethe in conversation with Eckermann said on May 6, 1827, 'Da kommen sie und fragen, welche Idee ich in meinem Faust zu verkörpern gesucht. Als ob ich das selber wüsste und aussprechen könnte.' Or with more special application to the Phaedrus I may quote Bourguet's review of Raeder, 'Cet ensemble, on pensera sans doute que M. Raeder a eu tort de le juger mal construit. Au lieu d'une imperfection d'assemblage, c'est le plan même que le sujet indiquait. INTRODUCTION main argument of the Republic, minor disproportions and irrelevancies disappear in the total impression of the unity and designed convergence of all its parts in a predetermined conclusion. If it pleases Plato to dwell a little longer than interests the modern reader on the expurgation of Homer (379 D-394), the regulation of warfare between Greek states (469-471 c), the postulates of elementary logic (438-439), the programme of the higher education (521 ff.) and its psychological presuppositions (522-524), and the justification of the banishment of the poets (595-608 c), criticism has only to note and accept the fact.

Socrates constructs the indispensable minimum (369 D-E) of a state or city from the necessities of human life, food, shelter, clothing, the inability of the isolated individual to provide for these needs and the principle of the division of labour.^a Plato is aware that the historic origin of society is to be looked for in the family and the clan. But he reserves this aspect of the subject for the Laws.^b The hypothetical, simple primitive state, which Glaucon stigmatizes as a city of pigs (372 D), is developed into a normal modern society or city by the demand for customary luxuries, and by Herbert Spencer's principle of "the multiplication of effects," one thing leading to another (373-374). The luxurious and inflamed city (372 E) is then purged and purified by the reform of ordinary Greek education,^c in which the expurgation of Homer and Homeric mythology holds a place that may weary the modern reader but is not disproportionate to the importance of the matter for Plato's generation and for the Christian Fathers who quote it almost entire. Luxury makes war unavoidable (373 E). The principle of division of labour (374 B-E) is applied to the military class, who receive a special education, and who, to secure the disinterested use of their power,^a are subjected to a Spartan discipline and not permitted to touch gold or to own property (416-417).

In such a state the four cardinal virtues, the definitions of which were vainly sought in the minor dialogues, are easily seen to be realizations on a higher plane of the principle of the division of labour.^b It is further provisionally assumed that the four cardinal virtues constitute and in some sort define goodness.^c The wisdom of such a state resides predominantly in the rulers (428); its bravery in the soldiers (429), who acquire from their education a fixed and settled right opinion as to what things are really to be feared. Its sobriety, moderation, and temperance (sophrosyne) are the willingness of all classes to accept this division of function (431 E). Its justice is the fulfilment of its own function by every class (433). A provisional psychology (435 c-d) discovers in the human soul faculties corresponding to the three social classes (435 E ff.).^d And the social and political definitions of these virtues are then seen to fit the individual. Sobriety and temperance are the acceptance by every faculty of this higher division of labour (441-442). Justice is the performance by every faculty of its proper task (433 A-B with 441 D). These definitions will stand the test of vulgar instances. The man whose own soul is inherently just in this ideal sense of the word will also be just in the ordinary relations of life. He will not pick and steal and cheat and break his promises (442 E-443 A). Justice in man and state is health. It is as absurd to maintain that the unjust man can be happier than the just as it would be to argue that the unhealthy man is happier than the healthy (445 A).^a Our problem is apparently solved.

It has been argued that this conclusion marks the end of a first edition of the Republic to which there are vague references in antiquity. There can be no proof for such an hypothesis.^b Plato's plan from the first presumably contemplated an ideal state governed by philosophers (347 D), and there is distinct reference in the first four books to the necessity of securing the perpetuity of the reformed state by the superior intelligence of its rulers.^c

Mr. Stephen adds, 'the two are not really divergent,' and this is the thesis which Plato strains every nerve to prove throughout the Republic and Laws."

INTRODUCTION

The transition at the beginning of the fifth book is quite in Plato's manner and recalls the transition in the Phaedo (84 c) to a renewal of the discussion of immortality. Here Glaucon and Adeimantus, as there Simmias and Cebes, are conversing in low tones and are challenged by Socrates to speak their mind openly (449 B). They desire a fuller explanation and justification of the paradox, too lightly let fall by Socrates, that the guardians will have all things in common, including wives and children (449 c, cf. 424 A). Socrates, after some demur, undertakes to expound this topic and in general the pre-conditions of the realization of the ideal state under the continued metaphor of three waves of paradox. They are (1) the exercise of the same functions by men and women (457 A, 453 to 457); (2) the community of wives (457 c); (3) (which is the condition of the realization of all these ideals) the postulate that either philosophers must become kings or kings philosophers.

The discussion of these topics and the digressions which they suggest give to this transitional book an appearance of confusion which attention to the clue of the three waves of paradox and the distinction between the desirability and the possibility of the Utopia contemplated will remove.^a The last few pages of the book deprecate prevailing prejudice against the philosophers and prepare the way for the theory and description of the higher education in Books VI and VII by distinguishing from the many pretenders the true philosophers who are those who are lovers of ideas, capable of appreciating them, and able to reason in abstractions.^b Whatever the metaphysical implications of this passage^a its practical significance for the higher education and the main argument of the Republic is that stated here.

The sixth book continues this topic with an enumeration of the qualities of the perfect student, the natural endowments that are the prerequisites of the higher education (485 ff.) and the reasons why so few (496 A) of those thus fortunately endowed are saved (494 A) for philosophy from the corrupting influences of the crowd and the crowd-compelling sophists.^b

In an ideal state these sports of nature (as Huxley styles them) will be systematically selected (499 B ff.), tested through all the stages of ordinary education and finally conducted by the longer way (504 B with 435 D) of the higher education in the abstract sciences and mathematics and dialectics to the apprehension of the idea of good, which will be their guide in the conduct of the state. This simple thought is expressed in a series of symbols—the sun (506 E ff.), the divided line (509 D), the cave (514 ff.)—which has obscured its plain meaning for the majority of readers.^c For the purposes of the Republic and apart from disputable metaphysical implications it means simply that ethics and politics ought to be something more than mere empiricism. Their principles and practice must be consistently related to a clearly conceived final standard and ideal of human welfare and good. To conceive such a standard and apply it systematically to the complications of institutions, law, and education is possible only for first-class minds who have undergone a severe discipline in abstract thought, supplemented by a long experience in affairs (484 A, 539 E). But it is even more impossible that the multitude should be critics than that they should be philosophers (494 A). And so this which is Plato's plain meaning has been lost in the literature of mystic and fanciful interpretation of the imagery in which he clothes it.

From these heights the seventh book descends to a sober account of the higher education in the mathematical sciences and dialectic (521 c ff.). The passage is an interesting document for Plato's conception of education and perhaps for the practice in his Academy. It also is the chief text for the controverted question of Plato's attitude towards science and the place of Platonism in the history of science, but it need not further detain us here.^a This book, in a sense, completes the description of the ideal state.

The eighth book, one of the most brilliant pieces of writing in Plato, is a rapid survey of the divergence, the progressive degeneracy from the ideal state in the four types to which Plato thinks the tiresome infinity of the forms of government that minute research enumerates among Greeks and barbarians may be conveniently reduced (544 c-d). These are the timocracy, whose principle is honour (545 c ff.), the oligarchy, which regards wealth (550 c ff., 551 c), the democracy, whose slogan is liberty, or "doing as one likes" (557 B-E), the tyranny, enslaved to appetite. In this review history, satire, political philosophy, and the special literary motives of the Republic are blended in a mixture hopelessly disconcerting to all literal-minded critics from Aristotle down.

In the first two types Plato is evidently thinking of the better (544 c) and the worse aspects (548 A) of Sparta. In his portrayal of the democratic state he lets himself go in satire of fourth-century Athens (557 B ff.), intoxicated with too heady draughts of liberty (562 D) and dying of the triumph of the liberal party. His picture of the tyrant is in part a powerful restatement of Greek commonplace (565 A-576) and in part a preparation for the return to the main argument of the Republic (577 ff.) by direct application of the analogy between the individual and the state with which he began.

In the ninth book all the lines converge on the original problem. After adding the final touches to the picture of the terrors and inner discords (576-580) of the tyrant's soul, Plato finally decides the issue between the just and the unjust life by three arguments. The just life is proved the happier (1) by the analogy with the contrasted happiness of the royal (ideal) and the unhappiness of the tyrannized state (577 c ff.), (2) by reason of an argument which Plato never repeats but which John Stuart Mill seriously accepts (582-583): The man who lives mainly for the higher spiritual satisfactions has necessarily had experience of the pleasures of sense and ambition also. He only can compare and judge. The devotees of sense and ambition know little or nothing of the higher happiness of the intellect and the soul.

INTRODUCTION

(3) The third and perhaps the most weighty proof is the principle on which the Platonic philosophy or science of ethics rests, the fact that the pleasures of sense are essentially negative, not to say worthless, because they are preconditioned by equivalent wants which are pains.^a This principle is clearly suggested in the Gorgias, Meno, Phaedrus, and Phaedo, and is elaborately explained in the psychology of the Philebus. It is in fact the basis of the Platonic ethics, which the majority of critics persist in deducing from their notion of Plato's metaphysics. These three arguments, however, are not the last word. For final conviction Plato falls back on the old analogy of health and disease, with which the fourth book provisionally concluded the argument, and which as we there saw is all that the scientific ethics of Leslie Stephen can urge in the last resort.^b The immoral soul is diseased and cannot enjoy true happiness. This thought is expressed in the image of the many-headed beast (588 c ff.) and confirmed in a final passage of moral eloquence which forms a climax and the apparent conclusion of the whole (591-592).

The tenth book may be regarded either as an appendix and after-piece or as the second and higher climax prepared by an intervening level tract separating it from the eloquent conclusion of the ninth book. The discussion in the first half of the book of the deeper psychological justification of the banishment of imitative poets is interesting in itself. It is something that Plato had to say and that could be said here with the least interruption of the general design. But its chief service is that it rests the emotions between two culminating points and so allows each its full force. Whether by accident or design, this method of composition is found in the Iliad, where the games of the twenty-third book relieve the emotional tension of the death of Hector in the twenty-second and prepare us for the final climax of the ransom of his body and his burial in the twenty-fourth. It is also found in the oration On the Crown, which has two almost equally eloquent perorations separated by a tame level tract. In Plato's case there is no improbability in the assumption of conscious design. The intrinsic preferability of justice has been proved and eloquently summed up. The impression of that moral eloquence would have been weakened if Plato had immediately proceeded to the myth that sets forth the rewards that await the just man in the life to come. And the myth itself is much more effective after an interval of sober argument and discussion. Then that natural human desire for variation and relief of monotony for which the modulations of Plato's art everywhere provide makes us welcome the tale of Er the son of Arminius (614 B), the "angel" from over there (614 D). And we listen entranced to the myth that was saved and will save us if we believe it—believe that the soul is immortal, capable of infinite issues of good and evil, of weal or woe. So shall we hold ever to the upward way and follow righteousness and sobriety with clear-eyed reason that we may be dear to ourselves and to God, both in the time of our sojourn and trial here below and also when, like victors in the games, we receive the final crown and prize, that thus both here and in all the millennial pilgrim's progress of the soul of which we fable we shall fare well (621 c-d).

This summary presents only the bare framework of the ideas of the Republic. But we may fittingly add here a partial list of the many brilliant passages of description, character-painting, satire, imagery, and moral eloquence dispersed through the work.

They include the dramatic introduction (327-331) with the picture of the old age of the just man, prefiguring the conclusion of the whole work; the angry intervention of Thrasymachus (336 B ff.); the altercation between Thrasymachus and Cleitophon (340); Thrasymachus perspiring under Socrates' questions because it was a hot day (350 D); the magnificent restatement of the case for injustice by Glaucon and Adeimantus (357-367); the Wordsworthian idea of the influence of a beautiful environment on the young soul (401); the satiric description of the valetudinarian and malade imaginaire (406-407); the eloquent forecast of the fate of a society in which the guardians exploit their charges and the watchdogs become grey wolves (416-417); the satire on the lazy workman's or socialist paradise (420 D-E); the completion of the dream and the first of three noble statements of what Emerson calls the sovereignty of ethics, the moral ideal, the anticipated Stoic principle that nothing really matters but the good will (443-444; cf. 591 E, 618 C); the soul that contemplates all time and all existence (486 A); the allegory of the disorderly ship and the riotous crew (488-489); the power of popular assemblies to posed between the years 380 and 370 B.C. in the fifth or sixth decade of Plato's life.^a

The tradition that the earlier books were published earlier can neither be proved nor disproved.^b

The invention of printing has given to the idea of "publication" a precision of meaning which it could not bear in the Athens of the fourth century B.C. Long before its formal completion the plan and the main ideas of Plato's masterpiece were doubtless familiar, not only to the students of the Academy but to the rival school of Isocrates and the literary gossips of Athens.

Unlike the presumably earlier Charmides, Laches, Lysis, Euthyphro, Meno, Protagoras, Gorgias, Euthydemus, the Republic is a positive, not to say a dogmatic, exposition of Plato's thought, and not, except in the introductory first book, an idealizing dramatization of Socrates' talks with Athenian youths and sophists.

Aristotle cites the Republic as the Politeia,^a and this was the name given to it by Plato. In 527 c it is playfully called the Kallipolis. The secondary title ἡ περὶ δικάσιον is not found in the best manuscripts, and, as the peculiar use of ἡ indicates, was probably added later.

But, as already said, we cannot infer from this that the ethical interest is subordinated to the political.^b The two are inseparable. The distinction between ethics and politics tends to vanish in early as in recent philosophy. Even Aristotle, who first perhaps wrote separate treatises on ethics and politics, combines them as ἡ περὶ τὰ ἀνθρώπινα φιλοσοφία. He speaks of ethics as a kind of politics. And though he regards the family and the individual as historically preceding the state, in the order of nature and the idea the state is prior. The modern sociologist who insists that the psychological and moral life of the individual apart from the social organism is an unreal abstraction is merely returning to the standpoint of the Greek who could not conceive man as a moral being outside of the polis.^c In the consciously figurative language of Plato,^d the idea of justice is reflected both in the individual and the state, the latter merely exhibits it on a larger scale. Or, to put it more simply, the true and only aim of the political art is to make the citizens happier by making them better.^e And though good men arise sporadically,^a and are preserved by the grace of God in corrupt states,^b the only hope for mankind is in a state governed by philosophical wisdom (473 D), and the ideal man can attain to his full stature and live a complete life only in the ideal city.^c

The larger part of the Republic is in fact occupied with the ideal state, with problems of education and social control, but, as already said, we are repeatedly reminded (supra, p. xii) that all these discussions are in Plato's intention subordinated to the main ethical proof that the just life is happier than the unjust. * Ethics takes precedence in that the final appeal is to the individual will and the individual thirst for happiness. Plato is to that extent an individualist and a utilitarian. Politics is primary in so far as man's moral life cannot exist outside of the state.

There are hints of the notion of an ideal state before Plato.^d And the literary motif of Utopia has a long history.^e But it was the success of the Republic and Laws that made the portrayal of the best state the chief problem, not to say the sole theme, of Greek political science. In Plato this was due to an idealistic temper and a conviction of the irremediable corruption of Greek social and political life. The place assigned to the ideal state in Aristotle's Politics is sometimes deplored by the admirers of the matter-of-fact and inductive methods of the first and fifth books. And in our own day the value of this motif for the serious science of society is still debated by sociologists.

The eternal fascination of the literary motif is indisputable, and we may enjoy without cavil the form which the artist Plato preferred for the exposition of his thought, while careful to distinguish the thoughts themselves from their sometimes fantastic embodiment. But we must first note one or two of the fundamental differences between the presuppositions of Plato's speculations and our own. (1) Plato's state is a Greek city, not a Persian empire, a European nation, or a conglomerate America. To Greek feeling complete and rational life was impossible for the inhabitant of a village or the subject of a satrap. It was attainable only through the varied social and political activities of the Greek polis, equipped with agora, gymnasium, assembly, theatre, and temple-crowned acropolis. It resulted from the action and interaction upon themselves and the world of intelligent and equal freemen conscious of kinship and not too numerous for self-knowledge or too few for self-defence. From this point of view Babylon, Alexandria, Rome, London, and New York would not be cities but chaotic aggregations of men. And in the absence of steam, telegraphy, and representative government the empires of Darius, Alexander, and Augustus would not be states but loose associations of cities, tribes, and provinces. Much of Plato's sociology is therefore inapplicable to modern conditions. But though we recognize, we must not exaggerate the difference. The Stoic and Christian city of God, the world citizenship into which the subjects of Rome were progressively adopted, the mediaeval papacy and empire, the twentieth-century democratic nation are the expressions of larger and perhaps more generous ideals. But in respect of the achievement of a complete life for all their members, they still remain failures or experiments. The city-state, on the other hand, has once and again at Athens and Florence so nearly solved its lesser problem as to make the ideal city appear not altogether a dream. And, accordingly, modern idealists are returning to the conception of smaller cantonal communities, interconnected, it is true, by all the agencies of modern science and industrialism, but in their social tissue and structure not altogether incomparable to the small city-state which Plato contemplated as the only practical vehicle of the higher life.

(2) The developments of science and industry have made the idea of progress an essential part of every modern Utopia. The subjugation of nature by man predicted in Bacon's New Atlantis has come more and more to dominate all modern dreams of social reform. It is this which is to lay the spectre of Malthusianism. It is this which is to give us the four-hour day and will furnish the workman's dwelling with all the labour-saving conveniences of electricity, supply his table with all the delicacies of all the seasons, entertain his cultivated leisure with automatic reproductions of all the arts, and place flying machines and automobiles at his disposal when he would take the air.

This is not the place to estimate the part of illusion in these fancies. It is enough to observe that in dwelling too complacently upon them modern utopians are apt to forget the moral and spiritual preconditions of any fundamental betterment of human life. Whereas Plato, conceiving the external condition of man's existence to be essentially fixed, has more to tell us of the discipline of character and the elevation of intelligence. In Xavier Demaistre's Voyage autour de ma chambre, Plato, revisiting the glimpses of the moon, is made to say, "In spite of your glorious gains in physical science, my opinion of human nature is unchanged—but I presume that your progress in psychology, history, and the scientific control of human nature, has by this time made possible that ideal Republic which in the conditions of my own age I regarded as an impracticable dream." Demaistre was sorely embarrassed for a reply. Have we one ready?

Living in a milder climate and before the birth of the modern industrial proletariat, Plato is less haunted than we by the problem of pauperism.^a And his austerity of temper would have left him indifferent, if not hostile, to the ideal of universal luxury and ease. It was not the life he appointed for his guardians, and the demand of the workers for it he has satirized in advance (420 D-E). If we add to the two points here considered some shades of ethical and religious feeling, associated with Christianity, we shall have nearly exhausted the list of fundamental differences between Plato's political and social thought and our own. The Republic, if we look beneath the vesture of paradox to the body of its substantive thought, might

^a Cf., however, Pöhlmann, Geschichte der sozialen Frage und des Sozialismus in der antiken Welt, who, however, in the opinion of some of his critics, exaggerates the industrialism and industrial problems of Athens.

INTRODUCTION

seem a book of yesterday or to-morrow. The conception of society as an organism, with the dependence of laws and institutions upon national temperament and customs, the omnipotence of public opinion, the division of labour and the reasons for it, the necessity of specialization, the formation of a trained standing army, the limitation of the right of private property, the industrial and political equality of women, the reform of the letter of the creeds in order to save the spirit, the proscription of unwholesome art and literature, the reorganization of education, eugenics, the kindergarten method, the distinction between higher and secondary education, the endowment of research, the application of the higher mathematics to astronomy and physics—all this and much more may be read in it by him who runs.

A critical interpretation would first remove some obstacles to a true appreciation interposed by capacious cavils or over-ingenious scholarship, and then proceed to study Plato's ideas (1) as embedded in the artistic structure of the Republic, (2) as the outgrowth of Plato's thought and experience as a whole, and of the suggestions that came to him from his predecessors and contemporaries. The Republic is, in Huxley's words, a "noble, philosophical romance"—it is a discussion of ethics, politics, sociology, religion and education cast in the form of a Utopia or an Émile. The criticism of Plato's serious meanings is one thing. The observation of the way in which they are coloured and heightened by the exigencies of this special literary form is another. Plato himself has told us that the Republic is a fairy-tale or fable about justice. And he has warned us that every such finished composition must contain a large measure of what in contrast to the severity of pure dialectic he calls jest or play.^a Within the work itself the artistic illusion had to be preserved. But even there Plato makes it plain that his chief purpose is to embody certain ideas in an ideal, not to formulate a working constitution or body of legislation for an actual state. An ideal retains its value even though it may never be precisely realized in experience. It is a pattern laid up in heaven for those who can see and understand. Plato will not even assert that the education which he prescribes is the best. He is certain only that the best education, whatever it may be, is a pre-condition of the ideal state (416 B-C). Somewhere in the infinite past or future—it may be in the barbarian world beyond our ken—the true city may be visioned whenever and wherever political power and philosophic wisdom are wedded and not as now divorced. He affirms no more.

It is a waste of ink to refute the paradoxes or harp upon the omissions of the Republic in disregard of these considerations. The paradoxes are softened and explained, the omissions supplied in the Politicus and the Laws, which express fundamentally identical ethical and political convictions from a slightly different point of view and a perhaps somewhat sobered mood.^b To assume that differences which are easily explained by the moulding of the ideas in their literary framework are caused by revolutions in Plato's beliefs is to violate all canons of sound criticism and all the established presumptions of the unity of Plato's thought.

The right way to read the Republic is fairly indicated by casual utterances of such critics as Renan, Pater, Emerson, and Émile Faguet. The captious attitude of mind is illustrated by the set criticism of Aristotle, the Christian Fathers, Zeller, De Quincey, Landor, Spencer, and too large a proportion of professional philologists and commentators. "As the poet too," says Emerson, "he (Plato) is only contemplative. He did not, like Pythagoras, break himself with an institution. All his painting in the Republic must be esteemed mythical with the intent to bring out, sometimes in violent colours, his thought."

This disposes at once of all criticism, hostile or friendly, aesthetic or philological, that scrutinizes the Republic as if it were a bill at its second reading in Parliament, or a draft of a constitution presented to an American state convention. The greater the ingenuity and industry applied to such interpretations the further we are led astray. Even in the Laws Plato warns us that we are not yet, but are only becoming, legislators.

In the Republic it suits Plato's design to build up the state from individual units and their economic needs. But his critics, from Aristotle to Sir Henry Maine, derive their conception of the patriarchal theory of society from his exposition of it in the Laws.

He embodies his criticism of existing Greek institutions in a scheme for the training of his soldiers, supplemented by the higher education of the guardians. But we cannot infer, as hasty critics have done, from 421 A that he would not educate the masses at all. The banishment of Homer is a vivid expression of Plato's demand that theology be purified and art moralized. But Milton wisely declined to treat it as a serious argument against the liberty of unlicensed printing in England. And nothing can be more preposterous than the statement still current in books of supposed authority that the severity of dialectics had suppressed in Plato the capacity for emotion and the appreciation of beauty. The abolition of private property among the ruling classes is partly the expression of a religious, a Pythagorean, not to say a Christian, ideal, which Plato reluctantly renounces in the Laws.^a But it is mainly a desperate attempt to square the circle of politics and justify the rule of the intelligent few by an enforced disinterestedness and the annihilation of all possible "sinister interests."^b All criticism that ignores this vital point is worthless.^c

The same may be said of the community of wives, which is further, as Schopenhauer remarks, merely a drastic expression of the thought that the breeding of men ought to be as carefully managed as that of animals. It is abandoned in the Laws. The detailed refutations of Aristotle are beside the mark, and the denunciations of the Christian Fathers and De Quincey and Landor are sufficiently met by Lucian's remark that those who find in the Republic an apology for licentiousness little apprehend in what sense the divine philosopher meant his doctrine of communistic marriage.

It is the height of naïveté to demonstrate by the statistics of a Parisian crèche that the children of the guardians would die in infancy, or to inquire too curiously into the risks they would run in accompanying their parents on horseback to war (466 F, 467 F).

INTRODUCTION

The comparison of the individual to the state is a suggestive analogy for sociology and at the same time a literary motif that is worth precisely what the writer's tact and skill can make of it. Plato's use of the idea is most effective. By subtle artifices of style the cumulative effect of which can be felt only in the original, the reader is brought to conceive of the social organism as one monster man or leviathan, whose sensuous appetites are the unruly mechanic mob, whose disciplined emotions are the trained force that checks rebellion within and guards against invasion from without, and whose reason is the philosophic statesmanship that directs each and all for the good of the whole. And conversely the individual man is pictured as a biological colony of passions and appetites which "swarm like worms within our living clay"—a curious compound of beast and man which can attain real unity and personality only by the conscious domination of the monarchical reason. The origination of this idea apparently belongs to Plato. But he can hardly be held responsible for the abuse of it by modern sociologists, or for Herbert Spencer's ponderous demonstration that with the aid of Huxley and Carpenter he can discover analogies between the body politic and the physiological body in comparison with which those of Plato are mere child's-play.

It is unnecessary to multiply illustrations of such matter-of-fact and misconceived criticism. Enough has been said perhaps to prepare the way for the broad literary common-sense appreciation of the Republic, which an intelligent reader, even of a translation, will arrive at for himself if he reads without prejudice and without checking at every little apparent oddity in the reasoning or the expression.

INTRODUCTION

The proper historical background for such a broad understanding of Plato's political and social philosophy is Thucydides' account of the thirty years' Peloponnesian war, which Hobbes translated in order to exhibit to England and Europe the evils of unbridled democracy. Thucydides' history is the ultimate source of all the hard-headed cynical political philosophy of Realpolitik and the Superman, from Machiavelli, Guicciardini, and Hobbes to Nietzsche and Bernardi. And in recent years the speeches which he attributes to the Athenian ambassadors proposing to violate the neutrality of Melos have been repeatedly rediscovered and quoted. They are merely the most drastic expression of a philosophy of life and politics which pervades the entire history and which I studied many years ago in a paper on the "Implicit Ethics and Psychology of Thucydides,"^a some of the ideas of which are reproduced apparently by accident in Mr. Cornford's Thucydides Mythistoricus. The moral disintegration of a prolonged world war is the predestined medium for the culture of this poisonous germ. And the Peloponnesian war was a world war for the smaller international system of the Greek states. It was for Greece that suicide which our civil war may prove to have been for the old American New England and Virginia, and which we pray the World War may not prove to have been for Europe. The analogy, which we need not verify in detail, is startling, though the scale in Greece was infinitely smaller. In both cases we see an inner ring or focus of intense higher civilization encompassed by a vast outer semi-civilized or barbarian world of colonization, places in the sun, trade monopolies, and spheres of influence. In both the inner ring is subdivided into jealous states whose unstable equilibrium depends on the maintenance of the balance of power between two great systems, one commercial, democratic, and naval, the other authoritative, disciplined, military. The speeches of Pericles and King Archidamus in Thucydides analyse, contrast, and develop the conflicting ideals and weigh sea power against land power, as the speeches of rival prime ministers have done in our day. I merely suggest the parallel. What concerns us here is that to understand Plato we must compare, I do not say identify, him with Renan writing about la réforme intellectuelle et morale of France after the année terrible, or, absit omen, an English philosopher of 1950 speculating on the decline and fall of the British Empire, or an American philosopher of 1980 meditating on the failure of American democracy. The background of the comparatively optimistic Socrates was the triumphant progressive imperialistic democracy of the age of Pericles, and the choric odes of the poets and prophets of the imaginative reason, Aeschylus and Sophocles. The background of Plato, the experience that ground to devilish colours all his dreams and permanently darkened his vision of life, was the world war that made shipwreck of the Periclean ideal and lowered the level of Hellenic civilization in preparation for its final overthrow. The philosophy which he strove to overcome in himself and others was the philosophy of the political speeches in Thucydides and of those bitter disillusionized later plays of Euripides. His middle age fell and his Republic was conceived in an Athens stagnating under the hateful oppression of the Spartan Junker dominating Greece in alliance with the unspeakable Persian. The environment of his old age and its masterpiece, the Laws, was the soft, relaxed, sensuous, cynical, pococurante, fin de siècle Athens of the New Comedy, drifting helplessly to the catastrophe of Chaeronea—the Athens which Isocrates expected to save by treaties of peace with all mankind and shutting up the wine-shops, and which Demosthenes vainly admonished to build up its fleet and drill its armies against the Macedonian peril. When Plato is characterized as an unpatriotic, undemocratic, conservative reactionary, false to the splendid Periclean tradition, we must remember that Pericles' funeral oration had become for all but the fourth of July orators of Plato's generation as intolerable and ironic a mockery as Lowell's Commemoration Ode and Lincoln's Gettysburg address will seem to America if democracy fails to unify us into a real people. His philosophy was "reactionary" in the sense that it was his own inevitable psychological and moral reaction against the sophistical ethics^a of the Superman on one side and on the other against the cult of inefficiency and indiscipline which he had come to regard as wholly inseparable from unlimited democracy. This reactionary aspect of Plato's political and social philosophy has been vividly depicted, though perhaps with some strained allusions to the democracy of contemporary France, in Faguet's five chapters on the hatreds of Plato.

INTRODUCTION

The equivocal labels radical and conservative mean little in their application to minds of the calibre of a Plato or even of a Burke. What really matters is the kind of conservative, the kind of radical that you are. As Mill says, there is a distinction ignored in all political classification, and more important than any political classification, the difference between superior and inferior minds.

As a thinker for all time, Plato in logical grasp and coherency of consecutive and subtle thought, stands apart from and above a Renan, a Burke, an Arnold, or a Ruskin. But as a man, his mood, inevitably determined by his historical environment, was that of Matthew Arnold in the 'sixties, endeavouring to prick with satire the hide of the British Philistine, or of Ruskin in the 'seventies embittered by the horrors of the Franco-Prussian War and seeking consolation in the political economy of the future. We may denominate him a conservative and a reactionary, in view of this personal mood and temper, and his despair of the democracy of fin de siècle Athens. But his Utopian Republic advocated not only higher education and votes, but offices for women, and a eugenic legislation that would stagger Oklahoma. And so if you turn to Professor Murray's delightful Euripides and his Age, you will read that Euripides is the child of a strong and splendid tradition and is, together with Plato, the first of all rebels against it. Suppose Professor Murray had written, Bernard Shaw is the child of a strong and splendid tradition and, together with Matthew Arnold, the first of all rebels against it. I think we should demur, and feel that something was wrong. We should decline to bracket Arnold and Shaw as rebels to English tradition, despite the fact that both endeavoured to stir up the British Philistine with satire and wit. As a matter of fact, Plato detested Euripides and all his works, and generally alludes to him with Aristophanic irony.

If we pass by the terrible arraignment in the Gorgias of the democracy that was guilty of the judicial murder of Socrates, the political philosophy of the minor dialogues is mainly a Socratic canvassing of definitions, and an apparently vain but illuminating quest for the supreme art of life, the art that will make us happy, the political or royal art, which guides and controls all else, including music, literature, and education. This conception is represented in the Republic by the poetic allegory of the Idea of Good and the description of the higher education of the true statesman which alone lends it real content. The matter is quite simple, and has been confused only by the refusal to accept Plato's own plain statements about it and the persistent tendency to translate Plato's good poetry into bad metaphysics.^a

The metaphysics of the Idea of Good will be treated in the introduction to the second volume. Here it is enough to quote Mr. Chesterton, who, whether by accident or design, in a lively passage of his Heretics, expresses the essential meaning of the doctrine in the political, ethical, and educational philosophy of the Republic quite sufficiently for practical purposes.

"Every one of the popular modern phrases and ideals is a dodge in order to shirk the problem of what is good. We are fond of talking about 'liberty'; that, as we talk of it, is a dodge to avoid discussing what is good. We are fond of talking about 'progress'; that is a dodge to avoid discussing what is good. We are fond of talking about 'education'; that is a dodge to avoid discussing what is good. The modern man says, 'Let us leave all these arbitrary standards and embrace liberty.' That is, logically rendered, 'Let us not decide what is good, but let it be considered good not to decide it.' He says, 'Away with your old moral formulae; I am for progress.' This, logically stated, means, 'Let us not settle what is good; but let us settle whether we are getting more of it.' He says, 'Neither in religion nor morality, my friend, lie the hopes of the race, but in education.' This, clearly expressed, means, 'We cannot decide what is good, but let us give it to our children.' " So far Mr. Chesterton.

^a Cf. my article "Summum Bonum" in Hastings' Encyclopedia of Religion and Ethics.

INTRODUCTION

Plato's Idea of Good, then, means that the education of his philosophic statesmen must lift them to a region of thought which transcends the intellectual confusion in which these dodges and evasions alike of the ward boss and the gushing settlement-worker dwell. He does not tell us in a quotable formula what the good is, because it remains an inexhaustible ideal. But he portrays with entire lucidity his own imaginative conception of Greek social good in his Republic and Laws.

The doctrine of the Idea of Good is simply the postulate that social well-being must be organized not by rule-of-thumb, hand-to-mouth opportunist politicians, but by highly trained statesmen systematically keeping in view large and consciously apprehended ends. The only way to compass this, Plato affirms, is first to prepare and test your rulers by the severest education physical and mental, theoretical and practical that the world has yet seen, and secondly to insure their freedom from what Bentham calls "sinister interests" by taking away from them their safe-deposit vaults and their investments in corporation stock and requiring them to live on a moderate salary and a reasonable pension.

This, or so much of it as may be translated into modern terms, is the essence of Plato's social and political philosophy.

But Plato's Republic, whatever its contributions to political theory or its suggestiveness to the practical politician or social reformer, is not a treatise on political science or a text-book of civics. It is the City of God in which Plato's soul sought refuge from the abasement of Athenian politics which he felt himself impotent to reform. The philosopher, he says (496 D) with unmistakable reference to Socrates (Apology 31 E) and apology for himself, knows that no politician is honest nor is there any champion of justice at whose side he may fight and be saved. He resembles a man fallen among wild beasts. He is unwilling to share and impotent singly to oppose their rapine. He is like one who in a driving storm of dust and sleet stands aside under shelter of a wall and seeing others filled full with all iniquity, must be content to live his own life, keep his soul unspotted from the world, and depart at last with peace and good will and gracious hopes. This is something. But how much more could he accomplish for himself and others, Plato wistfully adds, in a society in harmony with his true nature. And so he plays (it is his own word) with the construction of such a state. But when the dream is finished, his epilogue is: We have built a city in words, since it exists nowhere on earth, though there may be a pattern of it laid up in heaven. But whether it exists or not, the true philosopher will concern himself with the politics of this city only, of this city only will he constitute himself a citizen. As Emerson puts it, he was born to other politics. The witty and cynical Lucian mocks at this city in the clouds where Socrates lives all alone by himself, governed by his own laws. And I have no time to answer him now, even by enumeration of the great spirits who have taken refuge in the Platonic City of God. It was there that St. Augustine found consolation and hope in the crash and downfall of the Roman Empire. And fifteen hundred years later an unwonted glow suffuses the arid style of Kant when he speaks of the man who is conscious of an inward call to constitute himself by his conduct in this world the citizen of a better.

But to those political and social philosophers who disdain a fugitive and cloistered virtue and ask for some more helpful practical lesson than this, Plato's Republic offers two main suggestions.

The first is the way of St. Francis: the acceptance of the simple life, which by a startling coincidence Glaucon, in reply to Socrates, and the Pope, in remonstrance with St. Francis, designate as a city of pigs.^a But if we insist on a sophisticated civilization, a fevered city as Plato styles it, we shall find no remedy for the ills to which human nature is heir so long as our guiding principle is the equality of unequals (558 c) and the liberty of every one to do as he pleases. The only way of political and social salvation for such a state is self-sacrificing discipline, specialized efficiency, and government administered by men whom we have educated for the function and whom we compel to be unselfish.

We shall not wrong them by this suppression of their lower selves. For they will find in it their highest happiness and so apprehend the full meaning of old Hesiod's saying that the half is more than the whole.^a All this, though often confounded with the gospel of the strong man, is in Plato's intentions its diametrical opposite. Plato's strong man is not, and is not permitted to be, strong for himself. And finding his own happiness in duty fulfilled he will procure through just and wise government as much happiness as government and education can bestow upon men. Plato never loses faith in the leadership of the right leaders nor in the government of scholars and idealists, provided always that the scholarship is really the highest and severest that the age can furnish, the idealism tempered by long apprenticeship to practical administration, and the mortal nature which cannot endure the temptations of irresponsible power held in check by self-denying ordinances of enforced disinterestedness.

Such scholars in politics and such idealists, and they only, can do for us what the practical politician and the opportunist who never even in dreams have seen the things that are more excellent, can never achieve. Think you (Rep. 500) that such a man, if called to the conduct of human affairs and given the opportunity not merely to mould his own soul but to realize and embody his vision in the institutions and characters of men, will be a contemptible artizan of sobriety and righteousness and all social and human virtue? Will he not like an artist glance frequently back and forth from his model, the city in the clouds, home of the absolute good, the true and the beautiful, to the mortal copy which he fashions so far as may be in its image? And so mixing and mingling the pigments on his palette he will reproduce the true measure and likeness of man which even old Homer hints is or ought to be the likeness of God.

THE TEXT

Convention requires that something should be said about the text. How little need be said appears from the fact that the translation was originally made from two or three texts taken at random. The text of this edition was for convenience set up from the Teubner text, and the adjustments in either case have presented no difficulty. I have tried to indicate all really significant divergences and my reasons. That is all that the student of Plato's philosophy or literary art needs.

The tradition of the text of the Republic is excellent.^a The chief manuscripts have been repeatedly collated, and the Republic has been printed in many critical editions that record variations significant and insignificant. The text criticism of Plato to-day is a game that is played for its own sake, and not for any important results for the text itself or the interpretation. The validity of a new text to-day depends far more on acquaintance with Platonic Greek and Platonic thought than on any rigour of the text-critical and palaeographic game. Nothing whatever results from the hundred and six pages of ^a Cf. the work of Alline referred to supra, p. xxv, note b.

INTRODUCTION

"Textkritik" in the Appendix to Professor Wilamowitz's Platon. Adam repeatedly changed his mind about the readings of his preliminary text edition when he came to write his commentary, and with a candour rare in the irritabile genus of text critics withdrew an emendation which I showed to be superfluous by a reference to the Sophist.

The Jowett and Campbell edition devotes about a hundred pages of costly print to what are for the most part unessential and uncertain variations. As I said in reviewing it (A.J.P. xvi. pp. 229 ff.): "There is something disheartening in the exiguity of the outcome of all this toil, and one is tempted to repeat Professor Jowett's heretical dictum, that 'such inquiries have certainly been carried far enough and need no longer detain us from more important subjects.' There is really not much to be done with the text of Plato. The game must be played strictly according to the rules, but when it is played out we feel that it was hardly worth the midnight oil. The text of this edition must have cost Professor Campbell a considerable portion of the leisure hours of two or three years. Yet, as he himself says at the close of his interesting, if discursive, essay: 'Were the corruptions and interpolations of the text of the Republic as numerous as recent scholars have imagined, the difference of meaning involved would be still infinitesimal. Some feature of an image might be obscured, or some idiomatic phrase enfeebled, but Plato's philosophy would remain uninjured.'

"Of the twelve passages which Professor Campbell regards as still open to suspicion (vol. ii. p. 115), only two affect the sense even slightly. 387 c φρίττειν δὲ ποιεῖ ὡς οἶται, for which our editors read

ὥς οἶόν τε (which they refer to q, and the correction of Par. A by q, not to Par. A, as hitherto), rejecting Hermann's more vigorous ὅσ' ἔτη and not venturing to insert in the text L. C.'s suggestion, ὥς ἑτεά. In ix. 581 E, τῆς ἡδονῆς οὐ πάνυ πόρρω, there is no real difficulty if we accept, with nearly all editors, Graser's τί οἰώμεθα and place interrogation points after μανθάνοντα and πόρρω. Professor Jowett would retain ποιώμεθα and take the words τῆς ἡδονῆς οὐ πάνυ πόρρω as ironical; I do not care to try to convert anyone whose perceptions of Greek style do not tell him that this is impossible. Professor Campbell's suggestion, τῆς ἀληθινῆς, of which he thinks ἡδονῆς a substituted gloss, does not affect the meaning and supplies a plausible remedy for the seemingly objectionable repetition of ἡδονῆς. But it is, I think, unnecessary. The Platonic philosopher thinks that sensual pleasures are no pleasures. Cf. Philebus 44 C ὥστε καὶ αὐτὸ τοῦτο αὐτῆς τὸ ἐπαγωγὸν γοήτευμα οὐχ ἡδονὴν εἶναι. The difficulties in 388 E, 359 C, 567 E, 590 D, 603 C, 615 C are too trifling for further debate. 439 E ποτὲ ἀκούσας τι πιστεύω τούτῳ is certainly awkward. L. C.'s suggestion, οὐ πιστεύω τούτῳ, with changed reference of τούτῳ, equally so. 533 E ὁ ἄν μόνον δηλοῖ πρὸς τὴν ἕξιν σαφηνεῖα ὁ λέγει ἐν ψυχῇ is impossible, and the ingenuity is wasted that is spent upon it in the commentary to this result: 'An expression which may indicate with a clearness proportioned to the mental condition that of which it speaks as existing in the mind.' All we want is the thought of Charmides 163 D δῆλον δὲ μόνον ἐφ' ὃ τι ἄν φέρῃς τοῦνομα ὅτι ἄν λέγῃς, and that is given by the only tolerable text yet proposed, that of Hermann: ἀλλ' ὁ ἄν μόνον δηλοῖ πρὸς τὴν ἕξιν σαφήνειαν ἃ λέγει ἐν ψυχῇ (ἀρκέσει), which is ignored by our editors and which is indeed too remote from the mss. to be susceptible of proof. In 562 B the unwarranted ἐπέρπλουτος, which B. J. defends more suo, may be emended by deleting ἐπερ or by L. C.'s plausible suggestion, πον πλοῦτος. In 568 D L. C.'s suggestion, πωλουμένων, is as easy a way as any of securing the required meaning which grammar forbids us to extract from ἀποδομένων.

"Of the 29 passages in which the present text relies on conjectures by various hands, none affects the sense except possibly the obvious παισιν for πᾶσιν (494 B and 431 C), Schneider's palmary καὶ ἐτίμα μάλιστα for καὶ ἔτι μάλιστα, 554 B, Graser's τί οἰώμεθα, 581 D, Vermehren's χαίρων καὶ δυσχεραίνων, which restores concinnity in 401 E, and L. C.'s διὰ τοῦ bis, 440 C, for διὰ τὸ, an emendation which was pencilled on the margin of my Teubner text some years ago. The others restore a paragoge ν or a dropped ἄν or an iota subscript, or smooth out an anacoluthon. Professor Campbell himself suggests some fifteen emendations in addition to the one admitted to the text (vol. ii. p. 123); three or four of these have already been considered. Of the others the most important are the (in the context) cacophonous ἀξίως, 496 A, for ἄξιον which is better omitted altogether, with Hermann; ἐγγύς τι τείνων τῶν τοῦ σώματος for εἶναι, 518 D, which is clever and would commend itself but for a lingering doubt whether the phrase had not a half-humorous suggestion in Plato's usage; and ἡ οὐκ (sic q) . . . ἀλλοίαν τε [Stallb. for τοι] φήσεις, 500 A. It is unnecessary to follow Professor Campbell in his recension of the superfluous emendations of Cobet,

Madvig and others not admitted into the text. The man who prints an emendation that is not required but is merely possible Greek in the context is a thief of our time and should be suppressed by a conspiracy of silence. I could wish, however, that our editors had followed Hermann in admitting Nägelsbach's ἔτι ἀδυναμία, supported by a quotation from Iamblichus, for ἐπ' ἀδυναμία in 532 B-C. ἐπ' ἀδυναμία βλέπειν 'to look powerlessly,' i.e. 'to be without the power to see,' as our editors construe, after Schneider, makes large demands on our faith in the flexibility of Greek idiom, and Stallbaum's 'bei dem Unvermögen zu sehen' is not much better. Moreover, the ἔτι adds a touch that is needed; cf. 516 A πρῶτον μὲν, etc. For the rest, all this matter, with much besides, is conscientiously repeated in the commentary, though exhaustiveness is after all not attained, and many useful readings recorded in Stallbaum or Hermann are ignored. I have noted the following points, which might (without much profit) be indefinitely added to. In 332 E no notice is taken of the plausible προπολεμεῖν approved by Ast and Stephanus. In 365 B εἰ μὴ καὶ δοκῶ, which has sufficient ms. authority, is better than εἰ μὴ καὶ δοκῶ. The thought is: 'I shall profit nothing from being just (even) if I seem the opposite.' What our editors mean by saying that εἰ μὴ καὶ δοκῶ is more idiomatic I cannot guess. In 365 D, καὶ (οὐδ' Jowett and Campbell) ἡμῖν μελετήτων τοῦ λανθάνειν, I think the consensus of the mss. could be defended, despite the necessity for a negative that nearly all editors have felt here. The argument of the entire passage would run: There exist (1) political clubs ἐπὶ τὸ λανθάνειν, and (2) teachers of persuasion who will enable us to evade punishment if detected. But, you will say, we cannot (1) elude or (2) constrain the gods. The answer is (transferring the question to the higher sphere), as for gods, perhaps (1) they do not exist or are careless of mankind, or (2) can be persuaded or bought off by prayers and ceremonies. Accordingly, we must either (1) try to escape detection, as on the previous supposition, before the gods were introduced into the argument, or (2) invoke priests and hierophants as in the former case teachers of the art of persuasion. The logic of καὶ ἡμῖν μελητέον τοῦ λανθάνειν is loose, but it is quite as good as that of εἰ μὴ εἰσὶν as an answer to θεοὺς οὔτε λανθάνειν δυνατόν, and it is not absolutely necessary to read οὐδ', οὐκοιν τί or ἀμελητέον. The καὶ of καὶ ἡμῖν indicates an illogical but perfectly natural antithesis between 'us' on the present supposition and the members of the political clubs above. In 378 D our editors follow Baiter in punctuating after γραυσί. The antithesis thus secured between παιδία εὐθὺς and πρεσβυτέροις γιγνομένοις (an γενομένοις?) favours this. The awkwardness of the four times repeated ambiguous καὶ, and the difficulty of the dative with λογοποιεῖν and the emphasis thus lost of the triplet καὶ γέρονσι καὶ γραυσί καὶ πρεσβυτέροις γιγνομένοις, are against it. 397 A, L. C. accepts Madvig's (Schneider's?) μιμήσεται for διηγῆσεται, adversante B. J., but διηγῆσεται seems to be favoured by the balance of the sentence: πάντα τε μᾶλλον διηγῆσεται καὶ . . . οἰήσεται ὥστε πάντα ἐπιχειρήσει μιμῆσθαι. 442 C σοφὸν δέ γε ἐκείνῳ τῷ σμικρῷ μέρει τῷ ὃ ἦρχέ τ' ἐν αὐτῷ καὶ ταῦτα παρήγγελλεν ἔχον αὐτὸ κ' ἐκείνο, etc. Our editors seem to feel no difficulty in the τῷ ὃ, etc., nor do they note the omission of τῷ by Par. K and Mon. A simple remedy would be to omit the τῷ before ὁ and insert it after παρήγγελλεν, reading τῷ ἔχειν. In 451 A-B, in reading ὥστε εἶ (for οὐ) με παραμυθεῖ, our editors, here as elsewhere, over-estimate the possibilities of Socratic irony. 500 A. In arguing against the repetition of ἀλλοίαν in a different sense, 499 E-500 A, our editors should not have ignored the reading of M, ἀλλ' οἷαν (recorded, it is true, in the footnotes to the text), which, with the pointing and interrogation marks of Hermann, yields a much more vivacious and idiomatic text than that adopted here. Moreover, ἀλλὰ ἀποκρινεῖσθαι fits the defiant οὐκ αὖ δοκεῖ above much better if taken in the sense 'contradict us' than in the sense 'change their reply.' In 521 c Hermann's οἷσα ἐπάνοδος (after Iamblichus) is the only readable idiomatic text here. Only desperate ingenuity can construe the others. In 606 c the text or footnotes should indicate Hermann's δῆ (for δὲ), which the commentary rightly prefers."

INTRODUCTION

These observations are not intended as a renewal of Jowett's attack on text criticism or an illiberal disparagement of an indispensable technique. They merely explain why it was not thought necessary to waste the limited space of this edition by reprinting information which would interest a half dozen specialists at the most and which they know where to find in more detail than could possibly be given here.

The Republic has been endlessly edited, commented, summarized, and paraphrased (cf. supra, p. vii). The chief editions are enumerated in Ueberweg-Praechter, Die Philosophie des Altertums, 12th ed., Berlin (1926), pp. 190 ff. Schneidewin's edition is curt, critical, and sagacious. Stallbaum's Latin commentary is still useful for idioms and parallel passages. The two most helpful editions are English. The great three-volume work of Jowett and Campbell was critically reviewed by me in A.J.P. vol. xvi. pp. 223 ff., and from another point of view in the New York Nation, vol. lxi. (1895) pp. 82-84. Adam's painstaking and faithful commentary does not supersede, but indispensably supplements, Jowett and Campbell's. Apelt's German translation is, with a few exceptions, substantially correct, and the appended notes supply most of the information which the ordinary reader needs.

The history of the Platonic text is most amply set forth in the excellent and readable book of Alline (Histoire du texte de Platon, par Henri Alline, Paris, 1915). Other general discussions of the text and its history are: H. Usener, Unser Platontext (Kleine Schriften, vol. ii. pp. 104-162); M. Schanz, Studien zur Geschichte des platonischen Textes, Würzburg, 1874; Wohlrab, "Die Platon-Handschriften und ihre gegenseitigen Beziehungen," Jahrbücher für klassische Philologie, Suppl. 15 (1887), pp. 641-728. Cf. further Ueberweg-Praechter, vol. i., appendix pp. 67 ff. The manuscripts of Plato are enumerated and described by Jowett and Campbell, vol. ii. pp. 67-131, Essay II. "On the Text of this Edition of Plato's Republic"; less fully by Adam, who did not live to write a proposed introductory volume supplementing his commentary (The Republic of Plato, vol. i. pp. xiii-xvi); and, sufficiently for the ordinary student, by Maurice Croiset in the Budé Plato, vol. i. pp. 14-18.

The best manuscript is thought to be Parisinus graecus 1807 (ninth century), generally designated have lost my voice.^a But as it is, at the very moment when he began to be exasperated by the course of the argument I glanced at him first, so that I became capable of answering him and said with a slight tremor: "Thrasymachus, don't be harsh^b with us. If I and my friend have made mistakes in the consideration of the question, rest assured that it is unwillingly that we err. For you surely must not suppose that while^c if our quest were for gold^d we would never willingly truckle to one another and make concessions in the search and so spoil our chances of finding it, yet that when we are searching for justice, a thing more precious than much fine gold, we should then be so foolish as to give way to one another and not rather do our serious best to have it discovered. You surely must not suppose that, my friend. But you see it is our lack of ability that is at fault. It is pity then that we should far more reasonably receive from clever fellows like you than severity."

XI. And he on hearing this gave a great guffaw and laughed sardonically and said, "Ye gods! here we have the well-known irony^e of Socrates, and I knew it and predicted that when it came to replying you would refuse and dissemble and do anything rather than answer any question that anyone asked you." "That's because you are wise, Thrasymachus, and so you knew very well that if you asked a man how many are twelve, and in putting the question warned him: don't you be telling me, fellow, that twelve

Socrates' statement that the παθεῖν "due him" is μαθεῖν (gratis) affects Thrasymachus as the dicasts were affected by the proposal in the Apology that his punishment should be—to dine at the City Hall. The pun on the legal formula could be remotely rendered: "In addition to the recovery of your wits, you must pay a fine." Plato constantly harps on the taking is twice six or three times four or six times two or four times three, for I won't accept any such drivel as that from you as an answer—it was obvious I fancy to you that no one could give an answer to a question framed in that fashion. Suppose he had said to you, 'Thrasymachus, what do you mean? Am I not to give any of the prohibited answers, not even, do you mean to say, if the thing really is one of these, but must I say something different from the truth, or what do you mean?' What would have been your answer to him?" "Humph!" said he, "how very like the two cases are!" "There is nothing to prevent," said I; "yet even granted that they are not alike, yet if it appears to the person asked the question that they are alike, do you suppose that he will any the less answer what appears to him, whether we forbid him or whether we don't?" "Is that, then," said he, "what you are going to do? Are you going to give one of the forbidden answers?" "I shouldn't be surprised," I said, "if on reflection that would be my view." "What then," he said, "if I show you another answer about justice differing from all these, a better one—what penalty do you think you deserve?" "Why, what else," said I, "than that which it befits anyone who is ignorant to suffer? It befits him, I presume, to learn from the one who does know. That then is what I propose that I should suffer." "I like your simplicity,"^a said he, "but in addition to 'learning' you must pay a of money." "Well, I will when I have got it," I said. "It is there," said Glaucon: "if money is all that of pay by the Sophists, but Thrasymachus is trying to jest, too.

stands in the way, Thrasymachus, go on with your speech. We will all contribute for Socrates." "Oh yes, of course," said he, "so that Socrates may contrive, as he always does, to evade answering himself but may cross-examine the other man and refute his replies." "Why, how," I said, "my dear fellow, could anybody answer if in the first place he did not know and did not even profess to know, and secondly even if he had some notion of the matter, he had been told by a man of weight that he mustn't give any of his suppositions as an answer? XII. When I had spoken thus Glaucon and the others urged him not to be obstinate. It was quite plain that Thrasymachus was eager to speak in order that he might do himself credit, since he believed that he had a most excellent answer to our question. But he demurred and pretended to make a point of my being the respondent. Finally he gave way and then said, "Here you have the wisdom of Socrates, to refuse himself to teach, but go about and learn from others and not even pay thanks^b therefor." "That I learn from others," I said, "you said truly, Thrasymachus. But in saying that I do not pay thanks you are mistaken. I pay as much as I am able. And I am able only to bestow praise. The formula "justice is the advantage of the superior" means, as explained in Laws 714, that the ruling class legislates in its own interest, that is, to keep itself in power. This interpretation is here drawn out of Thrasymachus by Socrates' affected misapprehensions (cf. further Pascal, Pensées iv. 4, "la commodité du souverain." Leibniz approves Thrasymachus's definition: "justum potentiōri utile . . . nam Deus ceteris potentiōr!").

and hear then," said he. "I affirm that the just is nothing else than ^a the advantage of the stronger.^b Well, why don't you applaud? Nay, you'll do anything but that." "Provided only I first understand your meaning," said I; "for I don't yet apprehend it. The advantage of the stronger is what you affirm the just to be. But what in the world do you mean by this? I presume you don't intend to affirm this, that if Polydamas the pancratiast is stronger than we are and the flesh of beeves ^c is advantageous for him, for his body, this viand is also for us who are weaker than he both advantageous and just." "You are a buffoon,^d Socrates, and take my statement ^e in the most detrimental sense." "Not at all, my dear fellow," said I; "I only want you to make your meaning plainer."^f "Don't you know then," said he, "that some cities are governed by tyrants, in others democracy rules, in others aristocracy?"^g "Assuredly." strong and has the mastery^a in each—the ruling party? ” “ Certainly. ” “ And each form of government enacts the laws with a view to its own advantage, a democracy democratic laws and tyranny autocratic and the others likewise, and by so legislating they proclaim that the just for their subjects is that which is for their—the rulers’—advantage and the man who deviates^b from this law they chastise as a law-breaker and a wrongdoer. This, then, my good sir, is what I understand as the identical principle of justice that obtains in all states—the advantage of the established government. This I presume you will admit holds power and is strong, so that, if one reasons rightly, it works out that the just is the same thing everywhere,^c the advantage of the stronger. ” “ Now, ” said I, “ I have learned your meaning, but whether it is true or not I have to try to learn. But you add thereto that of the stronger. ” “ A trifling addition^d perhaps you think it, ” he said. “ It is not yet clear^e whether it is a big one either; but that we must inquire whether what you say is true, is clear. ” For since I too admit that the just is something that is of advantage^a—but you are for making an addition and affirm it to be the advantage of the stronger, while I don't profess to know,^b we must pursue the inquiry. "Inquire away," he said.

XIII. "I will do so," said I. "Tell me, then; you affirm also, do you not, that obedience to rulers is just?" "I do." "May I ask whether the rulers in the various states are infallible^c or capable sometimes of error?" "Surely," he said, "they are liable to err." "Then in their attempts at legislation they enact some laws rightly and some not rightly, do they not?" "So I suppose." "And by rightly we are to understand for their advantage, and by wrongly to their disadvantage? Do you mean that or not?" "That." "But whatever they enact^d must be performed by their subjects and is justice?" "Of course." "Then on your theory it is just not only to do what is the advantage of the stronger but also the opposite, what is not to his advantage." "What's that you're saying?^e" he replied. "What you yourself are saying,^f I think. Let us consider it more closely. admitted?" "I think it was," he replied. "Then you will have to think,"^a I said, that to do what is disadvantageous to the rulers and the stronger has been admitted by you to be just in the case when the rulers unwittingly enjoin what is bad for themselves, while you affirm that it is just for the others to do what they enjoined. In that way does not this conclusion inevitably follow, my most sapient^b Thrasymachus, that it is just to do the very opposite^c of what you say? For it is in that case surely the disadvantage of the stronger or superior that the inferior are commanded to perform." "Yes, by Zeus, Socrates," said Polemarchus, "nothing could be more conclusive." "Of course," said Cleitophon, breaking in, "if you are his witness."^d "What need is there of a witness?" Polemarchus said. "Thrasymachus himself admits that the rulers sometimes enjoin what is evil for themselves and yet says that it is just for the subjects to do this." "That, Polemarchus, is because Thrasymachus laid it down that it is just to obey the orders^e of the rulers." "Yes, Cleitophon, but he also took the position that the advantage of the stronger is just. And after these two assumptions he again admitted that the stronger sometimes bid the inferior and their subjects do what is to the disadvantage of the rulers. And from these admissions the just would no more be the advantage of the stronger than the contrary." "O well," said Cleitophon. "by the advantage of the superior he meant what the superior supposed to be lawful authority, and of disdain for a people or state that takes orders from another. Cleitophon does not apprehend the argument and, thinking only of the last clause, reaffirms the definition in the form "it is just to do what rulers bid." Polemarchus retorts: "And (I was right,) for he (also) . . ."

^b Thrasymachus rejects the aid of an interpretation which Socrates would apply not only to the politician's miscalculations but to his total misapprehension of his true ideal interests. He resorts to the subtlety that the ruler qua ruler is infallible, which Socrates meets by the fair retort that the ruler qua ruler, the artist qua artist has no "sinister" or selfish interest but cares only for the work. If we are to

for his advantage. This was what the inferior had to do, and that this is the just was his position." "That isn't what he said," replied Polemarchus. "Never mind, Polemarchus," said I, "but if that is Thrasyarchus's present meaning, let us take it from him^a in that sense.

"XIV. So tell me, Thrasyarchus, was this what you intended to say, that the just is the advantage of the superior as it appears to the superior whether it really is or not? Are we to say this was your meaning?" "Not in the least," he said; ^b "do you suppose that I call one who is in error a superior when he errs?" "I certainly did suppose that you meant that," I replied, "when you agreed that rulers are not infallible but sometimes make mistakes." "That is because you argue like a pettifogger, Socrates. Why, to take the nearest example, do you call one who is mistaken about the sick a physician in respect of his mistake or one who goes wrong in a calculation a calculator when he goes wrong and in respect of this error? Yet that is what we say literally—we say that the physician ^c erred and the calculator and the schoolmaster. But the truth, I take it, is, that each of these in so far as he is that which we entitle him never errs; so that, speaking precisely, since you are such a stickler for precision,^d no craftsman errs. For it is when his knowledge abandons him that he who goes wrong goes wrong—when he is not a craftsman. So that no craftsman, wise man, or ruler makes a mistake then when he is a ruler, though everybody would use the expression that the physician made a mistake and the ruler erred. It is in this loose way of speaking, then, that you must take the answer I gave you a little while ago. But the most precise statement is that other, that the ruler in so far forth as ruler does not err, and not erring he enacts what is best for himself, and this the subject must do, so that, even as I meant from the start, I say the just is to do what is for the advantage of the stronger.”

XV. “So then, Thrasymachus,” said I, “my manner of argument seems to you pettifogging?” “It does,” he said. “You think, do you, that it was with malice aforethought and trying to get the better of you unfairly that I asked that question?” “I don’t think it, I know it,” he said, “and you won’t make anything by it, for you won’t get the better of me by stealth and, failing stealth, you are not of the force^a to beat me in debate.” “Bless your soul,” said I, “I wouldn’t even attempt such a thing. But that nothing of the sort may spring up between us again, define in which sense you take the ruler and stronger. Do you mean the so-called ruler^b or that ruler in the precise sense of whom you were just now telling us, and for whose advantage as being the superior it will be just for the inferior to act?” “I mean the ruler in the very most precise sense of the word,” he said. “Now bring on against this your cavils and your shyster’s tricks if you are able. I ask no quarter. But you’ll find yourself unable.”

"Why, do you suppose," I said, "that I am so mad as to try to beard a lion^a and try the pettifogger on Thrasymachus?" "You did try it just now," he said, "paltry fellow though you be."^b "Something too much^c of this sort of thing," said I. "But tell me, your physician in the precise sense of whom you were just now speaking, is he a moneymaker, an earner of fees, or a healer of the sick? And remember to speak of the physician who is really such." "A healer of the sick," he replied. "And what of the pilot—the pilot rightly so called—is he a ruler of sailors or a sailor?" "A ruler of sailors." "We don't, I fancy, have to take into account the fact that he actually sails in the ship, nor is he to be denominated a sailor. For it is not in respect of his sailing that he is called a pilot but in respect of his art and his ruling of the sailors." "True," he said. "Then for each of them^d is there not a something that is for his advantage?" "Quite so." "And is it not also true," said I, "that the art naturally exists for this, to discover and provide for each his advantage?" "Yes, for this." "Is there, then, for each of the arts any other advantage than to be as perfect as possible^e?" "What do you mean by does not understand what is meant by saying that the art (=the artist qua artist) has no interest save the perfection of its (his) own function. Socrates explains that the body by its very nature needs art to remedy its defects (Herod. i. 32, Lysis 217 B). But the nature of art is fulfilled in its service, and it has no other ends to be accomplished by another art and so on ad infinitum. It is idle to cavil and emend the text, because of the shift from the statement (341 D) that art has no interest save its perfection, to the statement that it needs nothing except to be itself (342 A-B). The art and the artist qua artist are ideals whose being by hypothesis is their perfection.

that question ? ” “ Just as if,” I said, “ you should ask me whether it is enough for the body to be the body or whether it stands in need of something else, I would reply, ‘ By all means it stands in need. That is the reason why the art of medicine has now been invented, because the body is defective and such defect is unsatisfactory. To provide for this, then, what is advantageous, that is the end for which the art was devised.’ Do you think that would be a correct answer, or not ? ” “ Correct,” he said. “ But how about this ? Is the medical art itself defective or faulty, or has any other art any need of some virtue, quality, or excellence—as the eyes of vision, the ears of hearing, and for this reason is there need of some art over them that will consider and provide what is advantageous for these very ends—does there exist in the art itself some defect and does each art require another art to consider its advantage and is there need of still another for the considering art and so on ad infinitum, or will the art look out for its own advantage ? Or is it a fact that it needs neither itself nor another art to consider its advantage and provide against its deficiency ? For there is no defect or error at all that dwells in any art. Nor does it befit an art to seek the advantage of anything else than that of its object. But the art itself is free from all harm and admixture of evil, and is right so long as each art is precisely and entirely that which it is. And consider the matter in that ‘ precise ’ way of speaking. Is it so or not ? ” “ It appears to be so,” he said. “ Then medicine,” said I, “ does not consider the advantage of medicine but of the body ? ” “ Yes.” “ Nor horsemanship of horsemanship but of horses, nor does any other art look out

^a The next step is the identification of (true) politics with the disinterested arts which also rule and are the stronger. Cf. Xen. Mem. iii. 9. 11. γε emphasizes the argumentative implication of ἀρχουσι to which Thrasymachus assents reluctantly; and Socrates develops and repeats the thought for itself—for it has no need—but for that of which it is the art.” “So it seems,” he replied. “But surely,^a Thrasymachus, the arts do hold rule and are stronger than that of which they are the arts.” He conceded this but it went very hard. “Then no art considers or enjoins^b the advantage of the stronger but every art that of the weaker which is ruled by it.” This too he was finally brought to admit though he tried to contest it. But when he had agreed—“Can we deny, then,” said I, “that neither does any physician in so far as he is a physician seek or enjoin the advantage of the physician but that of the patient? For we have agreed that the physician, ‘precisely’ speaking, is a ruler and governor of bodies and not a money-maker. Did we agree on that?” He assented. “And so the ‘precise’ pilot is a ruler of sailors, not a sailor?” That was admitted. “Then that sort of a pilot and ruler will not consider and enjoin the advantage of the pilot but that of the sailor whose ruler he is.” He assented reluctantly. “Then,” said I, “Thrasymachus, neither does anyone in any office of rule in so far as he is a ruler consider and enjoin his own advantage but that of the one whom he rules and for whom he exercises his craft, and he keeps his eyes fixed on that and on what is advantageous and suitable to that in all that he says and does.”

* Thrasymachus first vents his irritation by calling Socrates a snivelling innocent, and then, like Protagoras (Protag. 334), when pressed by Socrates' dialectic makes a speech. He abandons the abstract (ideal) ruler, whom he assumed to be infallible and Socrates proved to be disinterested, for the actual ruler or shepherd of the people, who tends the flock only that he may shear it. All political experience and the career of successful tyrants, whom all men count happy, he thinks confirms this view, which is that of Callicles in the Gorgias. Justice is another's good which only the naive and "innocent" pursue. It is better to inflict than to suffer wrong. The main problem of the Republic is clearly indicated, but we are not yet ready to debate it seriously.

cussion and it was apparent to everybody that his formula of justice had suffered a reversal of form, Thrasymachus, instead of replying,^a said, "Tell me, Socrates, have you got a nurse?" "What do you mean?" said I. "Why didn't you answer me instead of asking such a question?" "Because," he said, "she lets her little 'snotty' run about drivelling^b and doesn't wipe your face clean, though you need it badly, if she can't get you to know^c the difference between the shepherd and the sheep." "And what, pray, makes you think that?" said I. "Because you think that the shepherds and the neat-herds are considering the good of the sheep and the cattle and fatten and tend them with anything else in view than the good of their masters and themselves; and by the same token you seem to suppose that the rulers in our cities, I mean the real rulers,^d differ at all in their thoughts of the governed from a man's attitude towards his sheep^e or that they think of anything else night and day than the sources of their own profit. And you

^a This (quite possible) sense rather than the ironical, "so far advanced," better accords with ἀγνοεῖς and with the direct brutality of Thrasymachus.

^b τῷ ὄντι like ὡς ἀληθῶς, ἀτεχνῶς, etc., marks the application (often ironical or emphatic) of an image or familiar proverbial or technical expression or etymology. Cf. 443 D, 442 A, 419 A, 432 A, Laches 187 B, Phileb. 64 E. Similarly ἐτήτυμον of a proverb, Archil. fr. 35 (87). The origin of the usage appears in Aristoph. Birds 507 τοῦτ' ἄρ' ἐκεῖν' ἦν τοῦπος ἀληθῶς, etc. Cf. Anth. Pal. v. 6. 3. With εὐηθικῶν, however, ὡς ἀληθῶς does not verify the etymology but ironically emphasizes the contradiction between the etymology and the conventional meaning, "simple," which Thrasymachus thinks truly fits those to whom Socrates would apply the full etymological meaning "of good character." Cf. 348 c, are so far out^a concerning the just and justice and the unjust and injustice that you don't know that justice and the just are literally^b the other fellow's good^c—the advantage of the stronger and the ruler, but a detriment that is all his own of the subject who obeys and serves; while injustice is the contrary and rules those who are simple in every sense of the word and just, and they being thus ruled do what is for his advantage who is the stronger and make him happy by serving him, but themselves by no manner of means. And you must look at the matter, my simple-minded Socrates, in this way: that the just man always comes out at a disadvantage in his relation with the unjust. To begin with, in their business dealings in any joint undertaking of the two you will never find that the just man has the advantage over the unjust at the dissolution of the partnership but that he always has the worst of it. Then again, in their relations with the state, if there are direct taxes or contributions to be paid, the just man contributes more from an equal estate and the other less, and when there is a distribution the one gains much and the other nothing. And so when each holds office, apart from any other loss the just

^c Justice not being primarily a self-regarding virtue, like prudence, is of course another's good. Cf. Aristot. Eth. Nic. 1130 a 3; 1134 b 5. Thrasymachus ironically accepts the formula, adding the cynical or pessimistic comment, "but one's own harm," for which see 392 B, Eurip. Heracleid. 1-5, and Isocrates' protest (viii. 32). Bion (Diog. Laert. iv. 7. 48) wittily defined beauty as "the other fellow's good"; which recalls Woodrow Wilson's favourite limerick, and the definition of business as "l'argent des autres."

* For the idea that the just ruler neglects his own business and gains no compensating "graft" cf. the story of Deïoces in Herod. i. 97, Democ. fr. 253 Diels, Laches 180 B, Isoc. xii. 145, Aristot. Pol. v. 8. 15-20. For office as a means of helping friends and harming enemies cf. Meno 71 E, Lysias ix. 14, and the anecdote of Themistocles (Plutarch, Præcept.

man must count on his own affairs^a falling into disorder through neglect, while because of his justice he makes no profit from the state, and thereto he will displease his friends and his acquaintances by his unwillingness to serve them unjustly. But to the unjust man all the opposite advantages accrue. I mean, of course, the one I was just speaking of, the man who has the ability to overreach on a large scale. Consider this type of man, then, if you wish to judge how much more profitable it is to him personally to be unjust than to be just. And the easiest way of all to understand this matter will be to turn to the most consummate form of injustice which makes the man who has done the wrong most happy and those who are wronged and who would not themselves willingly do wrong most miserable. And this is tyranny, which both by stealth and by force takes away what belongs to others, both sacred and profane, both private and public, not little by little but at one swoop.^b For each several part of such wrongdoing the malefactor who fails to escape detection is fined and incurs the extreme of contumely; for temple-robbers, kidnappers, burglars, swindlers, and thieves are the appellations of those who commit these several forms of injustice. But when in addition to the property of the citizens men kidnap and enslave the citizens themselves, instead of these opprobrious

(fr. 266 Diels) adds that the just ruler on laying down his office is exposed to the revenge of wrongdoers with whom he has dealt severely.

^b The order of words dramatically expresses Thrasy-machus's excitement and the sweeping success of the tyrant.

names they are pronounced happy and blessed^a not only by their fellow-citizens but by all who hear the story of the man who has committed complete and entire injustice.^b For it is not the fear of doing^c but of suffering wrong that calls forth the reproaches of those who revile injustice. Thus, Socrates, injustice on a sufficiently large scale is a stronger, freer, and more masterful thing than justice, and, as I said in the beginning, it is the advantage of the stronger that is the just, while the unjust is what profits a man's self and is for his advantage."

Nay, my good fellow, do your best to make the matter clear to us also: it will be no bad investment^a for you—any benefit that you bestow on such a company as this. For I tell you for my part that I am not convinced, neither do I think that injustice is more profitable^b than justice, not even if one gives it free scope and does not hinder it of its will.^c But, suppose, sir, a man to be unjust and to be able to act unjustly either because he is not detected or can maintain it by violence,^d all the same he does not convince me that it is more profitable than justice. Now it may be that there is someone else among us who feels in this way and that I am not the only one. Persuade us, then, my dear fellow, convince us satisfactorily that we are ill advised in preferring justice to injustice.” “And how am I to persuade you?”^e he said. “If you are not convinced by what I just now was saying, what more can I do for you? Shall I take the argument and ram^f it into your head?” “Heaven forbid!” I said, “don’t do that. But in the first place when you have said a thing stand by it,^g or if you shift your ground change openly and don’t try to deceive us. think fit afterwards to be consistent and maintain with precision the notion of the true shepherd, but you apparently think that he herds his sheep in his quality of shepherd, not with regard to what is best for the sheep, but as if he were a banqueter about to be feasted with regard to the good cheer or again with a view to the sale of them, as if he were a money-maker and not a shepherd. But the art of the shepherd^a surely is concerned with nothing else than how to provide what is best for that over which it is set, since its own affairs, its own best estate, are surely sufficiently provided for so long as it in nowise fails of being the shepherd's art. And in like manner I supposed that we just now were constrained to acknowledge that every form of rule^b in so far as it is rule considers what is best for nothing else than that which is governed and cared for by it, alike in political and private rule. Why, do you think that the rulers and holders of office in our cities—the true rulers^c—willingly hold office and rule?" "I don't think," he said, "I know right well they do."

XVIII. "But what of other forms of rule, Thrasy-machus? Do you not perceive that no one chooses of his own will to hold the office of rule, but they demand pay, which implies that not to them will benefit accrue from their holding office but to those whom they rule? For tell me this: we ordinarily say, do we not, that each of the arts is different from others because its power or function is different? And, my dear fellow, in order that we may reach some result, don't answer counter to your real belief.^a" "Well, yes," he said, "that is what renders it different." "And does not each art also yield us benefit^b that is peculiar to itself and not general,^c as for example medicine health, the pilot's art safety at sea, and the other arts similarly?" "Assuredly." "And does not the wage-earner's art yield wage? For that is its function. Would you identify medicine and the pilot's art? Or if you please to discriminate 'precisely' as you proposed, none the more if a pilot regains his health because a sea voyage is good for him, no whit the more, I say, for this reason do you call his art medicine, do you?" "Of course not," he said. "Neither, I take it, do you call wage-earning medicine if a man earning wages is in health." "Surely not." "But what of this? Do you call medicine wage-earning, if a man when giving treatment earns wages?" "No," he said. "And did we not agree that the benefit derived from each art is peculiar to it?" "So be it," he said. "Any common or general benefit that all craftsmen receive, then, they obviously derive from their common use of some further identical thing." "It seems so," he said. "And we say that the benefit of earning wages accrues to the craftsmen from their further exercise of the wage-earning art." He assented reluctantly to be the specific service of any of them, but must pertain to the special art μισθωτική. This refinement is justified by Thrasymachus's original abstraction of the infallible craftsman as such. It has also this much moral truth, that the good workman, as Ruskin says, rarely thinks first of his pay, and that the knack of getting well paid does not always go with the ability to do the work well. See Aristotle on χρηματιστική, Pol. i. 3 (1253 b 14).

"Then the benefit, the receiving of wages does not accrue to each from his own art. But if we are to consider it 'precisely' medicine produces health but the fee-earning art the pay, and architecture a house but the fee-earning art accompanying it the fee, and so with all the others, each performs its own task and benefits that over which it is set, but unless pay is added to it is there any benefit which the craftsman receives from the craft?" "Apparently not," he said. "Does he then bestow no benefit either when he works for nothing?" "I'll say he does." "Then, Thrasymachus, is not this immediately apparent, that no art or office provides what is beneficial for itself—but as we said long ago it provides and enjoins what is beneficial to its subject, considering the advantage of that, the weaker, and not the advantage of the stronger? That was why, friend Thrasymachus, I was just now saying that no one of his own will chooses to hold rule and office and take other people's troubles^a in hand to straighten them out, but everybody expects pay for that, because he who is to exercise the art rightly never does what is best for himself or enjoins it when he gives commands according to the art, but what is best for the subject. That is the reason, it seems, why pay^b must be provided for those who are to consent to rule, either in the form of money or honour or a penalty if they refuse."

XIX. "What do you mean by that, Socrates?" said Glaucon. "The two wages I recognize, but the penalty you speak of and described as a form of wage I don't understand."^c "Then," said I, "you don't understand the wages of the best men for the sake of which the finest spirits hold office and rule when they consent to do so. Don't you know that to be covetous of honour and covetous of money is said to be and is a reproach? "I do," he said. "Well, then," said I, "that is why the good are not willing to rule either for the sake of money or of honour. They do not wish to collect pay openly for their service of rule and be styled hirelings nor to take it by stealth from their office and be called thieves, nor yet for the sake of honour, for they are not covetous of honour. So there must be imposed some compulsion and penalty to constrain them to rule if they are to consent to hold office. That is perhaps why to seek office oneself and not await compulsion is thought disgraceful. But the chief penalty is to be governed by someone worse^a if a man will not himself hold office and rule. It is from fear of this, as it appears to me, that the better sort hold office when they do, and then they go to it not in the expectation of enjoyment nor as to a good thing,^b but as to a necessary evil and because they are unable to turn it over to better men than themselves or to their like. For we may venture to say that, if there should be a city of good men^c only, immunity from office-holding would be as eagerly contended for as office is now,^d and there it ^a εἰσαῦθις lays the matter on the table. Cf. 430 c. The suggestiveness of Thrasymachus's definition is exhausted, and Socrates turns to the larger question and main theme of the Republic raised by the contention that the unjust life is happier and more profitable than the just.

^b This is done in 358 D ff. It is the favourite Greek would be made plain that in very truth the true ruler does not naturally seek his own advantage but that of the ruled ; so that every man of understanding would rather choose to be benefited by another than to be bothered with benefiting him. This point then I by no means concede to Thrasy-machus, that justice is the advantage of the superior. But that we will reserve for another occasion.^a A far weightier matter seems to me Thrasy-machus's present statement, his assertion that the life of the unjust man is better than that of the just. Which now do you choose, Glaucon ? " said I, " and which seems to you to be the truer statement ? " " That the life of the just man is more profitable, I say," he replied. " Did you hear," said I, " all the goods that Thrasy-machus just now enumerated for the life of the unjust man ? " " I heard," he said, " but I am not convinced. " " Do you wish us then to try to persuade him, supposing we can find a way, that what he says is not true ? " " Of course I wish it," he said. " If then we oppose ^b him in a set speech enumerating in turn the advantages of being just and he replies and we rejoin, we shall have to count up and measure the goods listed in the respective speeches and we shall forthwith be in need of judges to decide between us. But if, as in the preceding discussion, we come to terms with one another as to what we admit in the inquiry, we shall be ourselves both judges and

^a Thrasymachus's "Umwertung aller Werte" reverses the normal application of the words, as Callicles does in Gorg. 491 E.

^b Thrasymachus recoils from the extreme position. Socrates' inference from the etymology of εὐήθεια (cf. 343 c) is repudiated. Injustice is not turpitude (bad character) but —discretion. εὐβουλία in a higher sense is what Protagoras teaches (Protag. 318 E) and in the highest sense is the wisdom of Plato's guardians (infra 428 B).

pleaders." "Quite so," he said. "Which method do you like best?" said I. "This one," he said.

XX. "Come then, Thrasymachus," I said, "go back to the beginning and answer us. You affirm that perfect and complete injustice is more profitable than justice that is complete." "I affirm it," he said, "and have told you my reasons." "Tell me then how you would express yourself on this point about them. You call one of them, I presume, a virtue and the other a vice?" "Of course." "Justice the virtue and injustice the vice?" "It is likely,"^a you innocent, when I say that injustice pays and justice doesn't pay." "But what then, pray?" "The opposite," he replied. "What! justice vice?" "No, but a most noble simplicity^b or goodness of heart." "Then do you call injustice badness of heart?" "No, but goodness of judgement." "Do you also, Thrasymachus, regard the unjust as intelligent and good?" "Yes, if they are capable of complete injustice," he said, "and are able to subject to themselves cities and tribes of men. But you probably suppose that I mean those who take purses. There is profit to be sure even in that sort of thing," he said, "if it goes undetected. But such things are not worth taking into the account, but only what I just described." "I am not unaware of your meaning in that," I said; "but this is what surprised me,"^c

^a Socrates understands the theory, and the distinction between wholesale injustice and the petty profits that are not worth mentioning, but is startled by the paradox that injustice will then fall in the category of virtue and wisdom. Thrasymachus affirms the paradox and is brought to self-contradiction by a subtle argument (349-350 c) which may pass as a dramatic illustration of the game of question and answer. Cf. Introd. p. x.

^a ἡδη marks the advance from the affirmation that injustice is profitable to the point of asserting that it is a virtue. This is a "stiffer proposition," i.e. harder to refute, or possibly more stubborn.

^b e.g. Polus in Gorg. 474 ff., 482 D-E. Cf. Isoc. De Pace 31. Thrasy-machus is too wary to separate the κακόν and the αἰσχρόν and expose himself to a refutation based on conventional usage. Cf. Laws 627 D, Polit. 306 A, Laws 662 A.

that you should range injustice under the head of virtue and wisdom, and justice in the opposite class." "Well, I do so class them," he said. "That," said I, "is a stiffer proposition,^a my friend, and if you are going as far as that it is hard to know what to answer. For if your position were that injustice is profitable yet you conceded it to be vicious and disgraceful as some other^b disputants do, there would be a chance for an argument on conventional principles. But, as it is, you obviously are going to affirm that it is honourable and strong and you will attach to it all the other qualities that we were assigning to the just, since you don't shrink from putting it in the category of virtue and wisdom." "You are a most veritable prophet," he replied. "Well," said I, "I mustn't flinch from following out the logic of the inquiry, so long as I conceive you to be saying what you think.^c For now, Thrasymachus, I absolutely believe that you are not 'mocking' us but telling us your real opinions about the truth.^d" "What difference does it make to you," he said, "whether I believe it or not? Why don't you test the argument?" "No difference," said I, "but here is something I want you to tell me in addition to what you have said. Do you think the just man would want to overreach^e or exceed another just ^a In pursuance of the analogy between the virtues and the arts the moral idea πλεονεξία (overreaching, getting more than your share; see on 359 c) is generalized to include doing more than or differently from. English can hardly reproduce this. Jowett's Shakespearian quotation (King John iv. ii. 28),

When workmen strive to do better than well,

They do confound their skill in covetousness, though apt, only illustrates the thought in part.

^a The assumption that a thing is what it is like is put as an inference from Thrasymachus's ready admission that the unjust man is wise and good and is like the wise and good. Jevons says in "Substitution of Similar": "Whatever is true of a thing is true of its like." But practical logic requires the qualification "in respect of their likeness." Socrates, man?" "By no means," he said; "otherwise he would not be the delightful simpleton that he is." "And would he exceed or overreach or go beyond the just action?" "Not that either," he replied. "But how would he treat the unjust man—would he deem it proper and just to outdo, overreach, or go beyond him or would he not?" "He would," he said, "but he wouldn't be able to." "That is not my question," I said, "but whether it is not the fact that the just man does not claim or wish to outdo the just man but only the unjust?" "That is the case," he replied. "How about the unjust then? Does he claim to overreach and outdo the just man and the just action?" "Of course," he said, "since he claims to overreach and get the better of everything." "Then the unjust man will overreach and outdo also both the unjust man and the unjust action, and all his endeavour will be to get the most in everything for himself." "That is so."

XXI. "Let us put it in this way," I said; "the just man does not seek to take advantage of his like but of his unlike, but the unjust man of both." "Admirably put," he said. "But the unjust man is intelligent and good and the just man neither." "That, too, is right," he said. "Is it not also true," I said, "that the unjust man is like the intelligent and good and the just man is not?" "Of course," he said, "being such he will be like to such and the other not." "Excellent. Then each is such^a as that to which he is like." "What else do you suppose?"

however, argues that since the just man is like the good craftsman in not overreaching, and the good craftsman is good, therefore the just man is good. The conclusion is sound, and the analogy may have a basis of psychological truth; but the argument is a verbal fallacy.

"I do not." "But would he the unmusical man?" "Of necessity," he said. "And how about the medical man? In prescribing food and drink would he want to outdo the medical man or the medical procedure?" "Surely not." "But he would the un-medical man?" "Yes." "Consider then with regard to all^d forms of knowledge and ignorance whether you think that anyone who knows would choose to do or say other or more than what another who knows would do or say, and not rather exactly what his like would do in the same action." "Why, perhaps it must be so," he said, "in such cases." "But what of the ignorant man—of him who does not know? Would he not overreach or outdo equally the knower and the ignorant?" "It may be." "But the one who knows is wise?" "I'll say so." "And the wise is good?" "I'll say so." "Then he who is good and wise will not wish to overreach his like but his unlike and opposite." "It seems so," he said. "But the bad man and the ignoramus will overreach both like and unlike?" "So it appears." "And does not our unjust man, Thrasymachus, overreach both unlike and like? Did you not say that?" "I did," he replied. "But the just man will not overreach his like but only his unlike?" "Yes." "Then the just man is like the wise and good, and the unjust is like the bad and the ignoramus." "It seems likely." "But furthermore we agreed that each is such as that to which he is like." "Yes, we did." "Then the just man has turned out^a on our hands to be good and wise and the unjust man bad and ignorant."

Thrasymachus made all these admissions not as I now lightly narrate them, but with much baulking and reluctance^b and prodigious sweating, it being summer, and it was then I beheld what I had never seen before—Thrasymachus blushing.^c But when we did reach our conclusion that justice is virtue and wisdom and injustice vice and ignorance, "Good," said I, "let this be taken as established."^d But we were also affirming that injustice is a strong and potent thing. Don't you remember, Thrasymachus?" "I remember," he said; "but I don't agree with what you are now saying either and I have an answer to it, but if I were to attempt to state it, I know very well that you would say that I was delivering a harangue.^e Either then allow me to speak at such length as I desire,^a or, if you prefer to ask questions, go on questioning and I, as we do for old wives^b telling their tales, will say 'Very good' and will nod assent and dissent." "No, no," said I, "not counter to your own belief." "Yes, to please you," he said, "since you don't allow me freedom of speech. And yet what more do you want?" "Nothing, indeed," said I; "but if this is what you propose to do, do it, and I will ask the questions." "Ask on, then." "This, then, is the question I ask, the same as before, so that our inquiry may proceed in sequence. What is the nature of injustice as compared with justice? For the statement made, I believe, was that injustice is a more potent and stronger thing than justice. But now," I said, "if justice is wisdom and virtue, it will easily, I take it, be shown to be also a stronger thing than injustice, since injustice is ignorance—no one could now fail to recognize that—but what I want is not quite so simple^c as that. I wish, Thrasy-machus, to consider it in some such fashion as this. A city, you would say, may be unjust and try to enslave other cities unjustly, have them enslaved and hold many of them in subjection." "Certainly," he said; "and this is what the best state will chiefly do, the state whose injustice is most complete." "I understand," I said, "that this was your view. But the point that I am considering is this: whether the city that thus shows itself superior to another will have this power without justice or whether she must of necessity combine it with justice." "If,^d" he replied, "what you were just now because but in spite of his injustice and by virtue of some saving residue of justice.

saying holds good, that justice is wisdom, with justice ; if it is as I said, with injustice." "Admirable, Thrasymachus," I said ; "you not only nod assent and dissent, but give excellent answers." "I am trying to please you," he replied.

XXIII. "Very kind of you. But please me in one thing more and tell me this : do you think that a city,^a an army, or bandits, or thieves, or any other group that attempted any action in common, could accomplish anything if they wronged one another ?" "Certainly not," said he. "But if they didn't, wouldn't they be more likely to?" "Assuredly." "For factions, Thrasymachus, are the outcome of injustice, and hatreds and internecine conflicts, but justice brings oneness of mind and love. Is it not so?" "So be it," he replied, "not to differ from you." "That is good of you, my friend ; but tell me this : if it is the business of injustice to engender hatred wherever it is found, will it not, when it springs up either among freemen or slaves, cause them to hate and be at strife with one another, and make them incapable of effective action in common?" "By all means." "Suppose, then, it springs up between two, will they not be at outs with and hate each other and be enemies both to one another and to the just?" "They will," he said. "And then will you tell me that if Kroll i. 20 expands this idea. Dante (Convivio i. xii.) attributes to the Philosopher in the fifth of the ethics the saying that even robbers and plunderers love justice. Locke (Human Understanding i. 3) denies that this proves the principles of justice innate: "They practise them as rules of convenience within their own communities," etc. Cf. further Isoc. xii. 226 on the Spartans, and Plato, Protag. 322 B, on the inconveniences of injustice in the state of nature, ἡδίκουν ἀλλήλους.

"And is it not apparent that its force is such that wherever it is found in city, family, camp, or in anything else, it first renders the thing incapable of co-operation with itself owing to faction and difference, and secondly an enemy to itself^b and to its opposite in every case, the just? Isn't that so?" "By all means." "Then in the individual too, I presume, its presence will operate all these effects which it is its nature to produce. It will in the first place make him incapable of accomplishing anything because of inner faction and lack of self-agreement, and then an enemy to himself and to the just. Is it not so?" "Yes." "But, my friend, the gods too^c are just." "Have it that they are," he said. "So to the gods also, it seems, the unjust man will be hateful, but the just man dear." "Revel in your discourse," he said, "without fear, for I shall not oppose you, so as not to offend your partisans here." "Fill up the measure of my feast,^d then, and complete it for me," I said, "by continuing to answer as you have been doing. Now that moral ideal. So Aristotle, Eth. Nic. 1179 a 24, proves that the σοφός being likeliest God is θεοφιλέστατος. Cf. Democ. fr. 217 D. μῦθοι θεοφιλέες ὅσοις ἐχθρόν τὸ ἀδικεῖν; infra 382 E, 612 E, Phileb. 39 E, Lysis 716 D. The "enlightened" Thrasy-machus is disgusted at this dragging in of the gods. Cf. Theaet. 162 D θεοὺς τε εἰς τὸ μέσον ἄγοντες. He is reported as saying (Diels p. 544. 40) that the gods regard not human affairs, else they would not have overlooked the greatest of goods, justice, which men plainly do not use.

^a For the idea cf. the argument in Protag. 327 c-d, that Socrates would yearn for the wickedness of Athens if he found himself among wild men who knew no justice at all.

^b The main ethical question of the Republic, suggested in 347 E, now recurs.

^c Similarly 578 c. What has been said implies that injustice is the corruption and disease of the soul (see on 445 A-B). But Socrates wishes to make further use of the argument from ἔργον or specific function.

the just appear to be wiser and better and more capable of action and the unjust incapable of any common action, and that if we ever say that any men who are unjust have vigorously combined to put something over, our statement is not altogether true, for they would not have kept their hands from one another if they had been thoroughly unjust, but it is obvious that there was in them some justice which prevented them from wronging at the same time one another too as well as those whom they attacked; and by dint of this they accomplished whatever they did and set out to do injustice only half corrupted^a by injustice, since utter rascals completely unjust are completely incapable of effective action—all this I understand to be the truth, and not what you originally laid down. But whether it is also true^b that the just have a better life than the unjust and are happier, which is the question we afterwards proposed for examination, is what we now have to consider. It appears even now that they are, I think, from what has already been said. But all the same we must examine it more carefully.^c For it is no ordinary^d matter that we are discussing, but the right conduct of life.” “Proceed with your inquiry,” he said. “I proceed,” said I. “Tell me then—would you say that a horse has a specific work^e or function?” “I would.” “Would you be willing its specific function. See Schmidt, Ethik der Griechen, i. p. 301, Newman, Introd. Aristot. Pol. p. 48. The following argument is in a sense a fallacy, since it relies on the double meaning of life, physical and moral (cf. 445 B and Cratyl. 399 D) and on the ambiguity of εὖ πράττειν, “fare well” and “do well.” The Aristotelian commentator, Alexander, animadverts on the fallacy. to define the work of a horse or of anything else to be that which one can do only with it or best with it?" "I don't understand," he replied. "Well, take it this way: is there anything else with which you can see except the eyes?" "Certainly not." "Again, could you hear with anything but ears?" "By no means." "Would you not rightly say that these are the functions of these (organs)?" "By all means." "Once more, you could use a dirk to trim vine branches and a knife and many other instruments." "Well," he said, "I do understand, and agree that the work of anything is that." "Very good," said I. "Do you not also think that there is a specific virtue or excellence of everything for which a specific work or function is appointed? Let us return to the same examples. The eyes we say have a function?" "They have." "Is there also a virtue of the eyes?" "There is." "And was there not a function of the ears?" "Yes." "And so also a virtue?" "Also a virtue." "And what of all other things? Is the case not the same?" "The same." "Take note now. Could the eyes possibly fulfil their function well if they lacked their own proper excellence and had in its stead the defect?" "How could they?" he said; "for I presume you meant blindness instead of vision." "Whatever," said I, "the excellence may be. For

Justice - excellence of the soul

THE REPUBLIC, BOOK I

I have not yet come^a to that question, but am only asking whether whatever operates will not do its own work well by its own virtue and badly by its own defect." "That much," he said, "you may safely affirm to be true." "Then the ears, too, if deprived of their own virtue will do their work ill?" "Assuredly." "And do we then apply the same principle to all things?" "I think so." "Then next consider this. The soul, has it a work which you couldn't accomplish with anything else in the world, as for example, management, rule, deliberation, and the like, is there anything else than soul to which you could rightly assign these and say that they were its peculiar work?" "Nothing else." "And again life? Shall we say that too is the function of the soul?" "Most certainly," he said. "And do we not also say that there is an excellence or virtue of the soul?" "We do." "Will the soul ever accomplish its own work well if deprived of its own virtue, or is this impossible?" "It is impossible." "Of necessity, then, a bad soul will govern and manage things badly while the good soul will in all these things do well."^b "Of necessity." "And did we not agree that the excellence or virtue of soul is justice and its defect injustice?" "Yes, we did." "The just soul and the just man then will live well and the unjust ill?" "So it appears," he said, "by your reasoning." "But furthermore, he who lives well is blessed and happy, and he who does not the contrary." "Of course." "Then the just is happy and the unjust miserable." "So be (English ed.), ii. p. 70. It does not seriously affect the validity of the argument, for it is used only as a rhetorical confirmation of the implication that κακῶς ἀρχειν, etc. = misery and the reverse of happiness.

it," he said. "But it surely does not pay to be miserable, but to be happy." "Of course not." "Never, then, most worshipful Thrasy-machus, can injustice be more profitable than justice." "Let this complete your entertainment, Socrates, at the festival of Bendis." "A feast furnished by you, Thrasy-machus," I said, "now that you have become gentle with me and are no longer angry.^a I have not dined well, however—by my own fault, not yours. But just as gluttons^b snatch at every dish that is handed along and taste it before they have properly enjoyed the preceding, so I, methinks, before finding the first object of our inquiry—what justice is—let go of that and set out to consider something about it, namely whether it is vice and ignorance or wisdom and virtue; and again, when later the view was sprung upon us that injustice is more profitable than justice I could not refrain from turning to that from the other topic. So that for me the present outcome of the discussion^c is that I know nothing.^d For if I don't know what the just is,^e I shall hardly know whether it is a virtue or not, and whether its possessor is or is not happy."

^a So in Philebus 11 c, Philebus cries off or throws up the sponge in the argument.

^b Aristotle borrows this classification from Plato (Topics 118 b 20-22), but liking to differ from his teacher, says in one place that the good which is desired solely for itself is the highest. The Stoics apply the classification to "preferables" (Diog. Laert. vii. 107). Cf. Hooker, Eccles. Pol. i. 11. Elsewhere Plato distinguishes goods of the soul, of the body, 108

I. When I had said this I supposed that I was done with the subject, but it all turned out to be only a prelude. For Glaucon, who is always an intrepid, enterprising spirit in everything, would not on this occasion acquiesce in Thrasymachus's abandonment^a of his case, but said, "Socrates, is it your desire to seem to have persuaded us or really to persuade us that it is without exception better to be just than unjust?" "Really," I said, "if the choice rested with me." "Well, then, you are not doing what you wish. For tell me: do you agree that there is a kind of good^b which we would choose to possess, not from desire for its after effects, but welcoming it for its own sake? As, for example, joy and such pleasures as are harmless^c and nothing results from them afterwards save to have and to hold the enjoyment." "I recognize that kind," said I. "And again a kind that we love both for its own sake and for its consequences,^a such as understanding,^b sight, and health?^c For these I presume we welcome for both reasons." "Yes," I said. "And can you discern a third form of good under which falls exercise and being healed when sick and the art of healing and the making of money generally? For of them we would say that they are laborious and painful yet beneficial, and for their own sake we would not accept them, but only for the rewards and other benefits that accrue from them." "Why yes," I said, "I must admit this third class also. But what of it?" "In which of these classes do you place justice?" he said. "In my opinion, I said, "it belongs in the fairest class, that which a man who is to be happy must love both for its own sake and for the results." "Yet the multitude," he said, "do not think so, but that it belongs to the toilsome class of things that must be practised for the sake of rewards and repute due to opinion but that in itself is to be shunned as an affliction."

But the Republic (583 D) like the Gorgias (493 E-494 C) knows the more technical distinction of the Philebus (42 C ff., 53 C ff.) between pure pleasures and impure, which are conditioned by desire and pain.

II. "I am aware," said I, "that that is the general opinion and Thrasyarchus has for some time been disparaging it as such and praising injustice. But I, it seems, am somewhat slow to learn." "Come now," he said, "hear what I too have to say and see if you agree with me. fied with the proof that has been offered about justice and injustice. For what I desire is to hear what each of them is and what potency and effect it has in and of itself dwelling in the soul,^a but to dismiss their rewards and consequences. This, then, is what I propose to do, with your concurrence. I will renew the argument of Thrasymachus and will first state what men say is the nature and origin of justice; secondly, that all who practise it do so reluctantly, regarding it as something necessary^b and not as a good; and thirdly, that they have plausible grounds for thus acting, since forsooth the life of the unjust man is far better than that of the just man—as they say; though I, Socrates, don't believe it. Yet I am disconcerted when my ears are dinned by the arguments of Thrasymachus and innumerable others.^c But the case for justice, to prove that it is better than injustice, I have never yet heard stated by any as I desire to hear it. What I desire is to hear an encomium on justice in and by itself. And I think I am most likely to get that from you. For which reason I will lay myself out in praise of the life of injustice, and in so speaking will give you an example of the manner in which I desire to hear from you in turn the dispraise of injustice and the praise of justice. Consider whether my proposal pleases you.” “Nothing could please me more,” said I; “for on what subject would a man of sense rather delight to hold and hear discourse again and again?” “That is excellent,” he said; “and now listen to what I said would be the first topic

^a Glaucon employs the antithesis between nature and law and the theory of an original social contract to expound the doctrine of Thrasymachus and Callicles in the Gorgias. His statement is more systematic than theirs, but the principle is the same; for, though Callicles does not explicitly speak of a

THE REPUBLIC, BOOK II

—the nature and origin of justice. By nature,^a they say, to commit injustice is a good and to suffer it is an evil, but that the excess of evil in being wronged is greater than the excess of good in doing wrong. So that when men do wrong and are wronged by one another and taste of both, those who lack the power to avoid the one and take the other determine that it is for their profit to make a compact with one another neither to commit nor to suffer injustice; and that this is the beginning of legislation and of covenants between men, and that they name the commandment of the law the lawful and the just, and that this is the genesis and essential nature of justice—a compromise between the best, which is to do wrong with impunity, and the worst, which is to be wronged and be impotent to get one's revenge. Justice, they tell us, being mid-way between the two, is accepted and approved, not as a real good, but as a thing honoured in the lack of vigour to do injustice, since anyone who had the power to do it and was in reality 'a man' would never make a compact with anybody neither to wrong nor to be wronged; for he would be mad. The nature, then, of justice is this and such as this, Socrates, and such are the conditions in which it originates, according to the theory.

III. "But as for the second point, that those who practise it do so unwillingly and from want of power to commit injustice—we shall be most likely to apprehend that if we entertain some such supposition as social contract, he implies that conventional justice is an agreement of the weak devised to hold the strong in awe (Gorg. 492 c), and Glaucon here affirms that no really strong man would enter into any such agreement. The social contract without the immoral application is also suggested in Protag. 322 B. Cf. also Crito 50 c, f.

this in thought: if we grant to each, the just and the unjust, licence and power to do whatever he pleases, and then accompany them in imagination and see whither his desire will conduct each. We should then catch the just man in the very act of resorting to the same conduct as the unjust man because of the self-advantage which every creature by its nature pursues as a good, while by the convention of law ^a it is forcibly diverted to paying honour to 'equality.'^b The licence that I mean would be most nearly such as would result from supposing them to have the power which men say once came to the ancestor of Gyges the Lydian.^c They relate that he was a shepherd in the service of the ruler at that time of Lydia, and that after a great deluge of rain and an earthquake the ground opened and a chasm appeared in the place where he was pasturing; and they say that he saw and wondered and went down into the chasm; and the story goes that he beheld other marvels there and a hollow bronze horse with little doors, and that he peeped in and saw a corpse within, as it seemed, of more than mortal stature, and that there was nothing else but a gold ring on its hand, which he took off and went forth. flocks, he also attended wearing the ring. So as he sat there it chanced that he turned the collet of the ring towards himself, towards the inner part of his hand, and when this took place they say that he became invisible^a to those who sat by him and they spoke of him as absent; and that he was amazed, and again fumbling with the ring turned the collet outwards and so became visible. On noting this he experimented with the ring to see if it possessed this virtue, and he found the result to be that when he turned the collet inwards he became invisible, and when outwards visible; and becoming aware of this, he immediately managed things so that he became one of the messengers who went up to the king, and on coming there he seduced the king's wife and with her aid set upon the king and slew him and possessed his kingdom. If now there should be two such rings, and the just man should put on one and the unjust the other, no one could be found, it would seem, of such adamant^b temper as to persevere in justice and endure to refrain his hands from the possessions of others and not touch them, though he might with impunity take what he wished even from the marketplace, and enter into houses and lie with whom he pleased, and slay and loose from bonds whomsoever he would, and in all other things conduct himself among mankind as the equal of a god.^c And in so acting he would do no differently from the other man, but both would pursue the same course. And yet this is a great proof, one might argue, that no one is just of his own will but only from constraint, in the belief that justice is not his personal good, inasmuch as every man, when he supposes himself to have the power to do wrong, does wrong. For that there is far more profit for him personally in injustice than in justice is what every man believes, and believes truly, as the proponent of this theory will maintain. For if anyone who had got such a licence within his grasp should refuse to do any wrong or lay his hands on others' possessions, he would be regarded as most pitiable^a and a great fool by all who took note of it,^b though they would praise him^c before one another's faces, deceiving one another because of their fear of suffering injustice. So much for this point.

IV. "But to come now to the decision^d between our two kinds of life, if we separate the most completely just and the most completely unjust man, we shall be able to decide rightly, but if not, not. How, then, is this separation to be made? Thus: we must subtract nothing of his injustice from the unjust man or of his justice from the just, but assume the perfection of each in his own mode of conduct. In the first place, the unjust man must act as clever craftsmen do: a first-rate pilot or physician, for example, feels the difference between impossibilities^e and possibilities in his art and attempts the one and lets the others go; and then, too, if he does happen to trip, he is equal to correcting his error. Similarly, the unjust man who attempts injustice rightly must be supposed to escape detection if he is to be altogether unjust, and we must regard the man who is caught as a bungler.^a For the height of injustice^b is to seem just without being so. To the perfectly unjust man, then, we must assign perfect injustice and withhold nothing of it, but we must allow him, while committing the greatest wrongs, to have secured for himself the greatest reputation for justice; and if he does happen to trip,^c we must concede to him the power to correct his mistakes by his ability to speak persuasively if any of his misdeeds come to light, and when force is needed, to employ force by reason of his manly spirit and vigour and his provision of friends and money; and when we have set up an unjust man of this character, our theory must set the just man at his side—a simple and noble man, who, in the phrase of Aeschylus, does not wish to seem but be good. Then we must deprive him of the seeming.^d For if he is going to be thought just he will have honours and gifts because of that esteem. We cannot be sure in that case whether he is just for justice' sake or for the sake of the gifts and the honours. So we must strip him bare of everything but justice and make his state the opposite of his imagined counterpart.^e Though doing no wrong he must have the repute of the greatest injustice, so that he may be put to the test as regards justice through not softening because of ill repute and the consequences thereof. But let him hold on his course unchangeable even unto death, seeming all his life to be unjust though being just, that so, both men attaining to the limit, the one of injustice,

V. "Bless me, my dear Glaucon," said I, "how strenuously you polish off each of your two men for the competition for the prize as if it were a statue!^a" "To the best of my ability," he replied, "and if such is the nature of the two, it becomes an easy matter, I fancy, to unfold the tale of the sort of life that awaits each. We must tell it, then; and even if my language is somewhat rude and brutal,^b you must not suppose, Socrates, that it is I who speak thus, but those who commend injustice above justice. What they will say is this: that such being his disposition the just man will have to endure the lash, the rack, chains, the branding-iron in his eyes, and finally, after every extremity of suffering, he will be crucified,^c and so will learn his lesson that not to be but to seem just is what we ought to desire. And the saying of Aeschylus^d was, it seems, far more correctly applicable to the unjust man. For it is literally true, they will say, that the unjust man, as pursuing what clings closely to reality, to truth, and not regulating his life by opinion, desires not to seem but to be unjust, ^c μεγαλοπρεπῶς. Usually a word of ironical connotation in Plato.

^d Cf. Euthyphro 12 E ff. and supra 331 B, θεῶ θυσίας, where they say that if he enters into lawsuits, public or private, he wins and gets the better of his opponents, and, getting the better,^a is rich and benefits his friends and harms his enemies^b; and he performs sacrifices and dedicates votive offerings to the gods adequately and magnificently,^c and he serves and pays court^d to men whom he favours and to the gods far better than the just man, so that he may reasonably expect the favour of heaven^e also to fall rather to him than to the just. So much better they say, Socrates, is the life that is prepared for the unjust man from gods and men than that which awaits the just."

VI. When Glaucon had thus spoken, I had a mind to make some reply thereto, but his brother Adeimantus said, "You surely don't suppose, Socrates, that the statement of the case is complete?" "Why, what else?" I said. "The very most essential point," said he, "has not been mentioned." "Then," said I, "as the proverb has it, 'Let a brother help a man'^f—and so, if Glaucon omits any word or deed, do you come to his aid. Though for my part what he has already said is quite enough to overthrow me and incapacitate me for coming to the rescue of justice." "Nonsense," he said, "but listen to this further point. We must set forth the reasoning and the language of the opposite party, of those who commend justice and dispraise injustice, if what I conceive to be Glaucon's meaning is to be made more clear. Fathers, when they address exhortations to their sons, and all the respectable morality of the good Cephalus is virtually identical with this commercial view of religion.

those who have others in their charge,^a urge the necessity of being just, not by praising justice itself, but the good repute with mankind that accrues from it, the object that they hold before us being that by seeming to be just the man may get from the reputation office and alliances and all the good things that Glaucon just now enumerated as coming to the unjust man from his good name. But those people draw out still further this topic of reputation. For, throwing in good standing with the gods, they have no lack of blessings to describe, which they affirm the gods give to pious men, even as the worthy Hesiod and Homer^b declare, the one that the gods make the oaks bear for the just:

Acorns on topmost branches and swarms of bees on their mid-trunks, and he tells how the Flocks of the fleece-bearing sheep are laden and weighted with soft wool, and of many other blessings akin to these; and similarly the other poet:

Even as when a good king, who rules in the fear of the high gods,

Upholds justice and right, and the black earth yields him her foison,

Barley and wheat, and his trees are laden and weighted with fair fruits,

Increase comes to his flocks and the ocean is teeming with fishes.

And Musaeus and his son^c have^d a more excellent

Emerson, Compensation: "He (the preacher) assumed that judgement is not executed in this world; that the wicked are successful; that the good are miserable; and then urged from reason and scripture a compensation to be made to both parties in the next life. No offence appeared to be taken by the congregation at this doctrine."

song^a than these of the blessings that the gods bestow on the righteous. For they conduct them to the house of Hades in their tale and arrange a symposium of the saints,^b where, reclined on couches and crowned with wreaths, they entertain the time henceforth with wine, as if the fairest meed of virtue were an everlasting drunk. And others extend still further the rewards of virtue from the gods. For they say that the children's children^c of the pious and oath-keeping man and his race thereafter never fail. Such and such-like are their praises of justice. But the impious and the unjust they bury in mud^d in the house of Hades and compel them to fetch water in a sieve,^e and, while they still live, they bring them into evil repute, and all the sufferings that Glaucon enumerated as befalling just men who are thought to be unjust, these they recite about the unjust, but they have nothing else to say.^f Such is the praise and the censure of the just and of the unjust.

VII. "Consider further, Socrates, another kind of language about justice and injustice employed by both laymen and poets. All with one accord reiterate that soberness and righteousness are fair and honourable, to be sure, but unpleasant and laborious, while licentiousness and injustice are pleasant and easy to win and are only in opinion and by convention disgraceful. They say that injustice pays better than justice, natorum" and opines that Homer took Il. xx. 308 from Orpheus.

^a The gnostic poets complain that bad men prosper for a time, but they have faith in the late punishment of the wicked and the final triumph of justice.

^b There is a striking analogy between Plato's language here and the description by Protestant historians of the sale of indulgences by Tetzel in Germany. Rich men's doors is proverbial. Cf. 489 B.

^c Cf. Mill, "Utility of Religion," Three Essays on Religion, p. 90: "All positive religions aid this self-delusion. Bad religions teach that divine vengeance may be bought off by for the most part, and they do not scruple to felicitate bad men who are rich or have other kinds of power and to do them honour in public and private, and to dishonour and disregard those who are in any way weak or poor, even while admitting that they are better men than the others. But the strangest of all these speeches are the things they say about the gods^a and virtue, how so it is that the gods themselves assign to many good men misfortunes and an evil life, but to their opposites a contrary lot; and begging priests^b and soothsayers go to rich men's doors and make them believe that they by means of sacrifices and incantations have accumulated a treasure of power from the gods^c that can expiate and cure with pleasurable festivals any misdeed of a man or his ancestors, and that if a man wishes to harm an enemy, at slight cost he will be enabled to injure just and unjust alike, since they are masters of spells and enchantments^d that constrain the gods to serve their end. And for all these sayings they cite the poets as witnesses, with regard to the ease and plentifulness of vice, quoting :

Evil-doing in plenty a man shall find for the seeking;
Smooth is the way and it lies near at hand and is easy to enter;

But on the pathway of virtue the gods put sweat from the first step,^e

and a certain long and uphill road. And others cite offerings or personal abasement." Plato, Laws 885 D, anticipates Mill. With the whole passage compare the scenes at the founding of Cloudeuckootown, Aristoph. Birds 960-990, and more seriously the mediaeval doctrine of the "treasure of the church" and the Hindu tapas.

^a In Laws 933 D both are used of the victim with ἐρωδᾶς, which primarily applies to the god. Cf. Lucan, Phars. vi. 492 and 527.

Homer as a witness to the beguiling of gods by men, since he too said :

The gods themselves are moved by prayers,
And men by sacrifice and soothing vows,
And incense and libation turn their wills Praying, whene'er they have sinned and made transgression.^a

And they produce a bushel ^b of books of Musaeus and Orpheus, the offspring of the Moon and of the Muses, as they affirm, and these books they use in their ritual, and make not only ordinary men but states believe that there really are remissions of sins and purifications for deeds of injustice, by means of sacrifice and pleasant sport ^c for the living, and that there are also special rites for the defunct, which they call functions, that deliver us from evils in that other world, while terrible things await those who have neglected to sacrifice.

VIII. "What, Socrates, do we suppose is the effect of all such sayings about the esteem in which men and gods hold virtue and vice upon the souls that hear them, the souls of young men who are quick-witted and capable of flitting, as it were, from one expression of opinion to another and inferring from them all the character and the path whereby a man would lead the best life? Such a youth ^d would most likely put to himself the question Pindar asks, 'Is it by Alcibiades standing at the crossways of life and debating in his mind whether his best chance of happiness lay in accepting the conventional moral law that serves to police the vulgar or in giving rein to the instincts and appetites of his own stronger nature. To confute the one, to convince the other, became to him the main problem of moral philosophy." Cf. Intro. x-xi; also "The Idea of Good in Plato's Republic," p. 214.

justice or by crooked deceit that I the higher tower shall scale and so live my life out in fenced and guarded security?' The consequences of my being just are, unless I likewise seem so, not assets,^a they say, but liabilities, labour and total loss; but if I am unjust and have procured myself a reputation for justice a godlike life is promised. Then since it is 'the seeming,' as the wise men^b show me, that 'masters the reality' and is lord of happiness, to this I must devote myself without reserve. For a front and a show^c I must draw about myself a shadow-outline of virtue, but trail behind me the fox of the most sage Archilochus,^d shifty and bent on gain. Nay, 'tis objected, it is not easy for a wrong-doer always to lie hid.^e Neither is any other big thing facile, we shall reply. But all the same if we expect to be happy, we must pursue the path to which the footprints of our arguments point. For with a view to lying hid we will organize societies and political clubs,^f and there are teachers of cajolery^g who impart the arts of the popular assembly and the court-room. So that, partly by persuasion, partly by force, we shall contrive to overreach with impunity. But against the gods, it may be said, neither secrecy nor force can avail. do not concern themselves with the doings of men, neither need we concern ourselves with eluding their observation.^a If they do exist and pay heed, we know and hear of them only from such discourses and from the poets who have described their pedigrees. But these same authorities tell us that the gods are capable of being persuaded and swerved from their course by 'sacrifice and soothing vows' and dedications. We must believe them in both or neither. And if we are to believe them, the thing to do is to commit injustice and offer sacrifice from the fruits of our wrong-doing.^b For if we are just, we shall, it is true, be unscathed by the gods, but we shall be putting away from us the profits of injustice; but if we are unjust, we shall win those profits, and, by the importunity of our prayers, when we transgress and sin we shall persuade them and escape scot-free. Yes, it will be objected, but we shall be brought to judgement in the world below for our unjust deeds here, we or our children's children. 'Nay, my dear sir,' our calculating friend^c will say, 'here again the rites for the dead^d have much efficacy, and the absolving divinities, as the greatest cities declare, and the sons of gods, who became the poets and prophets^e of the gods, and who reveal that this is the truth.'

IX. "On what further ground, then, could we prefer justice to supreme injustice? If we combine this with a counterfeit decorum, we shall prosper to our heart's desire, with gods and men, in life and death, as the words of the multitude and of men of the highest Sicily, Cic. *In C. authority declare. In consequence, then, of all that has been said, what possibility is there, Socrates, that any man who has the power of any resources of mind, money, body, or family should consent to honour justice and not rather laugh ^a when he hears her praised? In sooth, if anyone is able to show the falsity of these arguments, and has come to know with sufficient assurance that justice is best, he feels much indulgence for the unjust, and is not angry with them, but is aware that except a man by inborn divinity of his nature disdains injustice, or, having won to knowledge, refrains from it, no one else is willingly just, but that it is from lack of manly spirit or from old age or some other weakness ^b that men dispraise injustice, lacking the power to practise it. The fact is patent. For no sooner does such an one come into the power than he works injustice to the extent of his ability. And the sole cause of all this is the fact that was the starting-point of this entire plea of my friend here and of myself to you, Socrates, pointing out how strange it is that of all you self-styled advocates of justice, from the heroes of old whose discourses survive to the men of the present day, not one has ever censured injustice or commended justice otherwise than in respect of the repute, the honours, and the gifts that accrue from each. But what each one of them is in itself, by its own inherent force, when it is within the soul of the possessor and escapes the eyes of both gods and men, no one has ever adequately set forth in poetry or prose—the proof that the one is the greatest of all evils that the soul contains within itself, while justice is the greatest good. For if you had all spoken in this way from the beginning and from our youth up had sought to convince us, we should not now be guarding against one another's injustice, but each would be his own best guardian, for fear lest by working injustice he should dwell in communion with the greatest of evils.^a This, Socrates, and perhaps even more than this, Thrasymachus and haply another might say in pleas for and against justice and injustice, inverting their true potencies, as I believe, grossly. But I—for I have no reason to hide anything from you—am laying myself out to the utmost on the theory, because I wish to hear its refutation from you. Do not merely show us by argument that justice is superior to injustice, but make clear to us what each in-and-of-itself does to its possessor, whereby the one is evil and the other good. But do away with the repute of both, as Glaucon urged. For, unless you take away from either the true repute and attach to each the false, we shall say that it is not justice that you are praising but the semblance, nor injustice that you censure, but the seeming, and that you really are exhorting us to be unjust but conceal it, and that you are at one with Thrasymachus in the opinion that justice is the other man's good,^b the advantage of the stronger, and that injustice is advantageous and profitable to oneself but disadvantageous to the inferior. Since, then, you have admitted that justice belongs to the class of those highest goods which are desirable both for their consequences and still more for their own sake, as sight, hearing, intelligence, yes and health too, and all other goods that are productive^c by their very nature and not by opinion, this is what I would have you praise about justice—the benefit which it and the harm which injustice inherently works upon its possessor. But the rewards and the honours that depend on opinion, leave to others to praise. For while I would listen to others who thus commended justice and disparaged injustice, bestowing their praise and their blame on the reputation and the rewards of either, I could not accept that sort of thing from you unless you say I must, because you have passed your entire life^a in the consideration of this very matter. Do not, then, I repeat, merely prove to us in argument the superiority of justice to injustice, but show us what it is that each inherently does to its possessor—whether he does or does not escape the eyes of gods and men—whereby the one is good and the other evil.”

X. While I had always admired the natural parts of Glaucon and Adeimantus, I was especially pleased by their words on this occasion, and said: “It was excellently spoken of you, sons of the man we know,^b in the beginning of the elegy which the admirer^c of Glaucon wrote when you distinguished yourselves in the battle of Megara^d—

Sons of Ariston,^e whose race from a glorious sire is god-like.

This, my friends, I think, was well said. For there must indeed be a touch of the god-like in your disposition if you are not convinced that injustice is preferable to justice though you can plead its case in such fashion. And I believe that you are really not convinced. I infer this from your general character, since from your words alone I should have distrusted you. But the more I trust you the more I am at a loss what to make of the matter. I do not know how I can come to the rescue. For I doubt my ability for the reason that you have not accepted the arguments whereby I thought I proved against Thrasymachus that justice is better than injustice. Nor yet again do I know how I can refuse to come to the rescue. For I fear lest it be actually impious to stand idly by when justice is reviled and be faint-hearted and not defend her so long as one has breath and can utter his voice. The best thing, then, is to aid her as best I can." Glaucon, then, and the rest besought me by all means to come to the rescue and not to drop the argument but to pursue to the end the investigation as to the nature of each and the truth about their respective advantages. I said then as I thought: "The inquiry we are undertaking is no easy one but calls for keen vision, as it seems to me. So, since we are not clever persons, I think we should employ the method of search that we should use if we, with not very keen vision, were bidden to read small letters from a distance, and then someone had observed that these same letters exist elsewhere larger and on a larger surface. We should have accounted it a godsend, I fancy, to be allowed to read those letters first, and then examine the smaller, if they are the same." "Quite so," said Adeimantus; "but what analogy to this do you detect in the inquiry about justice?" "I will tell you," I said: "there is a justice of one man, we say, and, I suppose, also of an entire city?" "Assuredly," said he. "Is not the city larger^a than the man?" "It is larger," he said. "Then, perhaps, there would be more justice in the larger object and more easy to apprehend. If it please you, then, let us first look for its quality in states, and then only examine it also in the individual, looking for the likeness of the greater in the form of the less." "I think that is a good suggestion," he said. "If, then," said I, "our argument should observe the origin^a of a state, we should see also the origin of justice and injustice in it?" "It may be," said he. "And if this is done, we may expect to find more easily what we are seeking?" "Much more." "Shall we try it, then, and go through with it? I fancy it is no slight task. Reflect, then." "We have reflected,^b" said Adeimantus; "proceed and don't refuse."

^c Often imitated, as e.g. Hooker, Eccles. Pol. i. 10: "Forasmuch as we are not by ourselves sufficient to furnish

XI. "The origin of the city, then," said I, "in my opinion, is to be found in the fact that we do not severally suffice for our own needs,^c but each of us lacks many things. Do you think any other principle establishes the state?" "No other," said he. "As a result of this, then, one man calling in another for one service and another for another, we, being in need of many things, gather many into one place of abode as associates and helpers, and to this dwelling together we give the name city or state, do we not?" "By all means." "And between one man and another there is an interchange of giving, if it so happens, and taking, because each supposes this to be better for himself." "Certainly." "Come, then, let us create a city from the beginning, in our ourselves with a competent store of things needful for such a life as our nature doth desire . . . therefore to supply these defects . . . we are naturally inclined to seek communion and fellowship with others; this was the cause of men uniting themselves at first in civil societies."

theory. Its real creator, as it appears, will be our needs." "Obviously." "Now the first and chief of our needs is the provision of food for existence and life."^a "Assuredly." "The second is housing and the third is raiment and that sort of thing." "That is so." "Tell me, then," said I, "how our city will suffice for the provision of all these things. Will there not be a farmer for one, and a builder, and then again a weaver? And shall we add thereto a cobbler and some other purveyor for the needs of the body?" "Certainly." "The indispensable minimum of a city, then, would consist of four or five men." "Apparently." "What of this, then? Shall each of these contribute his work for the common use of all? I mean shall the farmer, who is one, provide food for four and spend fourfold time and toil on the production of food and share it with the others, or shall he take no thought for them and provide a fourth portion of the food for himself alone in a quarter of the time and employ the other three-quarters, the one in the provision of a house, the other of a garment, the other of shoes, and not have the bother of associating with other people, but, himself for himself, mind his own affairs?"^b And Adeimantus said, "But, perhaps, Socrates, the former way is easier." "It would not, by Zeus, be at all strange," said I; "for now that you have mentioned it, it occurs to me myself that, to begin with, our several natures are not all alike but different. One man is naturally fitted for one task, and another for kind of rhetorical advantage to the expression of the view that he intends to reject. In what follows Plato anticipates the advantages of the division of labour as set forth in Adam Smith, with the characteristic exception of its stimulus to new inventions. Cf. Intro. xv.

another. Don't you think so?" "I do." "Again, would one man do better working at many tasks or one at one?" "One at one," he said. "And, furthermore, this, I fancy, is obvious—that if one lets slip the right season, the favourable moment in any task, the work is spoiled." "Obvious." "That, I take it, is because the business will not wait upon the leisure of the workman, but the workman must attend to it as his main affair, and not as a by-work." "He must indeed." "The result, then, is that more things are produced, and better and more easily when one man performs one task according to his nature, at the right moment, and at leisure from other occupations." "By all means." "Then, Adeimantus, we need more than four citizens for the provision of the things we have mentioned. For the farmer, it appears, will not make his own plough if it is to be a good one, nor his hoe, nor his other agricultural implements, nor will the builder, who also needs many; and similarly the weaver and cobbler." "True." "Carpenters, then, and smiths and many similar craftsmen, associating themselves with our hamlet, will enlarge it considerably." "Certainly." "Yet it still wouldn't be very large even if we should add to them neat-herds and shepherds and other herders, so that the farmers might have cattle for ploughing,^a and the builders oxen to use with the farmers for transportation, and the weavers and cobblers hides and fleeces for their use." "It wouldn't be a small city, either, if it had all these." "But further," said I, "it is practically impossible to establish the city in a region where it will not need imports." "It is." "There will be a further need, then, of those who will bring in from some other city what it requires." "There will." "And again, if our servitor goes forth empty-handed, not taking with him any of the things needed by those from whom they procure what they themselves require, he will come back with empty hands, will he not?" "I think so." "Then their home production must not merely suffice for themselves but in quality and quantity meet the needs of those of whom they have need." "It must." So our city will require more farmers and other craftsmen." "Yes, more." "And also of other ministrants who are to export and import the merchandise. These are traders, are they not?" "Yes." "We shall also need traders, then." "Assuredly." "And if the trading is carried on by sea, we shall need quite a number of others who are expert in maritime business." "Quite a number."

XII. "But again, within the city itself how will they share with one another the products of their labour? This was the very purpose of our association and establishment of a state." "Obviously," he said, "by buying and selling." "A market-place, then, and money as a token^a for the purpose of exchange will be the result of this." "By all means." "If, then, the farmer or any other craftsman taking his products to the market-place does not arrive at the same time with those who desire to exchange with him, is he to sit idle in the market-place and lose time from his own work?" "By no means," he said, "but there are men who see this need and appoint themselves for this service—in well-conducted cities they are generally those who are weakest^b in body and those who are useless for any other task. They must wait there in the agora and exchange money for goods with those who wish to sell, and goods for money with as many as desire to buy." "This need, then," said I, "creates the class of shopkeepers in our city. Or is not shopkeepers the name we give to those who, planted in the agora, serve us in buying and selling, while we call those who roam from city to city merchants?" "Certainly." "And there are, furthermore, I believe, other servitors who in the things of the mind are not altogether worthy of our fellowship, but whose strength of body is sufficient for toil; so they, selling the use of this strength and calling the price wages, are designated, I believe, wage-earners, are they not?" "Certainly." "Wage-earners, then, it seems, are the complement that helps to fill up the state." "I think so." "Has our city, then, Adeimantus, reached its full growth and is it complete?" "Perhaps." "Where, then, can justice and injustice be found in it? And along with which of the constituents that we have considered does it come into the state?" "I cannot conceive, Socrates," he said, "unless it be in some need that those very constituents have of one another." "Perhaps that is a good suggestion," said I; "we must examine it and not hold back. First of all, then, let us consider what will be the manner of life of men thus provided. Will they not make bread and wine and garments and shoes? And they will build themselves houses and carry on their work in summer for the most part unclad and unshod and in winter clothed slaves. And for their nourishment they will provide meal from their barley and flour from their wheat, and kneading and cooking these they will serve noble cakes and loaves on some arrangement of reeds, or clean leaves, and, reclined on rustic beds strewn with bryony and myrtle, they will feast with their children, drinking of their wine thereto, garlanded and singing hymns to the gods in pleasant fellowship, not begetting offspring beyond their means lest they fall into poverty or war?"

XIII. Here Glaucon broke in: "No relishes^a apparently," he said, "for the men you describe as feasting." "True," said I; "I forgot that they will also have relishes—salt, of course, and olives and cheese; and onions and greens, the sort of things they boil in the country, they will boil up together. But for dessert we will serve them figs and chickpeas and beans, and they will toast myrtle-berries and acorns before the fire, washing them down with moderate potations; and so, living in peace and health, they will probably die in old age and hand on a like life to their offspring." And he said, "If you were founding a city of pigs,^b Socrates, what other fodder than this would you provide?" "Why, what would you have, Glaucon?" said I. "What is customary," he replied; "they must recline on couches, I presume, if they are not to be uncomfortable, and dine from tables and have made dishes and sweetmeats such as are now in use." "Good," said I, "I understand. It is not merely the origin of a city, it seems, that we are considering but the origin of a luxurious city. Perhaps that isn't such a bad suggestion, either. For by observation of such a city it may be we could discern the origin of justice and injustice in states. The true state I believe to be the one we have described—the healthy state, as it were. But if it is your pleasure that we contemplate also a fevered state, there is nothing to hinder. For there are some, it appears, who will not be contented with this sort of fare or with this way of life; but couches will have to be added thereto and tables and other furniture, yes, and relishes and myrrh and incense and girls^a and cakes—all sorts of all of them. And the requirements we first mentioned, houses and garments and shoes, will no longer be confined to necessities,^b but we must set painting to work and embroidery, and procure gold and ivory and similar adornments, must we not?" "Yes," he said. "Then shall we not have to enlarge the city again? For that healthy state is no longer sufficient, but we must proceed to swell out its bulk and fill it up with a multitude of things that exceed the requirements of necessity in states, as, for example, the entire class of huntsmen, and the imitators,^c many of them occupied with figures and colours and many with music—the necessity." Cf. 369 D "the indispensable minimum of a city." The historical order is: (1) arts of necessity, (2) arts of pleasure and luxury, (3) disinterested science. shall go to war^a as the next step, Glaucon—or what will happen? ” “What you say,” he said. “And we are not yet to speak,” said I, “of any evil or good effect of war, but only to affirm that we have further^b discovered the origin of war, namely, from those things from which^c the greatest disasters, public and private, come to states when they come.” “Certainly.” “Then, my friend, we must still further enlarge our city by no small increment, but by a whole army, that will march forth and fight it out with assailants in defence of all our wealth and the luxuries we have just described.” “How so?” he said; “are the citizens themselves^d not sufficient for that?” “Not if you,” said I, “and we all were right in the admission we made when we were moulding our city. We surely agreed, if you remember, that it is impossible for one man to do the work of many arts well.” “True,” he said. “Well, then,” said I, “don’t you think that the business of fighting is an art and a profession?” “It is indeed,” he said. “Should our concern be greater, then, for the cobbler’s art than for the art of war?” “By no means.” “Can we suppose,^e then, that while we were evolved society in which the ethics of militarism will disappear.

at pains to prevent the cobbler from attempting to be at the same time a farmer, a weaver, or a builder instead of just a cobbler, to the end that^a we might have the cobbler's business well done, and similarly assigned to each and every one man one occupation, for which he was fit and naturally adapted and at which he was to work all his days, at leisure^b from other pursuits and not letting slip the right moments for doing the work well, and that yet we are in doubt whether the right accomplishment of the business of war is not of supreme moment? Is it so easy^c that a man who is cultivating the soil will be at the same time a soldier and one who is practising cobbling or any other trade, though no man in the world could make himself a competent expert at draughts or the dice who did not practise that and nothing else from childhood^d but treated it as an occasional business? And are we to believe that a man who takes in hand a shield or any other instrument of war springs up on that very day a competent combatant in heavy armour or in any other form of warfare—though no other tool will make a man be an artist or an athlete by his taking it in hand, nor will it be of any service to those who have neither acquired the science^e of it nor sufficiently practised themselves in its use?" "Great indeed," he said, "would be the value of tools in that case!"

XV. "Then," said I, "in the same degree that the task of our guardians^f is the greatest of all, it would require more leisure than any other business and the greatest science and training." "I think so," said he.

"Does it not also require a nature adapted to that very pursuit?" "Of course." "It becomes our task, then, it seems, if we are able, to select which and what kind of natures are suited for the guardianship of a state." "Yes, ours." "Upon my word," said I, "it is no light task that we have taken upon ourselves. But we must not faint so far as our strength allows." "No, we mustn't." "Do you think," said I, "that there is any difference between the nature of a well-bred hound for this watch-dog's work and that of a well-born lad?" "What point have you in mind?" "I mean that each of them must be keen of perception, quick in pursuit of what it has apprehended,^a and strong too if it has to fight it out with its captive." "Why, yes," said he, "there is need of all these qualities." "And it must, further, be brave^b if it is to fight well." "Of course." "And will a creature be ready to be brave that is not high-spirited, whether horse or dog or anything else? Have you never observed what an irresistible and invincible thing is spirit,^c the presence of which makes every soul in the face of everything fearless and unconquerable?" "I have." "The physical qualities of the guardian, then, are obvious." "Yes." "And also those of his soul, namely that he must be of high spirit." "Yes, this too." "How then, Glaucon," said I, "will they escape being savage to one another^d and to the other citizens if this is to be their nature?" "Not easily, by Zeus," said he. "And yet we must have them gentle to their friends and harsh to their enemies; otherwise they will not await their destruction at the hands of others, but will be first themselves in bringing it about." "True," he said. "What, then, are we to do?" said I. "Where shall we discover a disposition that is at once gentle and great-spirited? For there appears to be an opposition^a between the spirited type and the gentle nature." "There does." "But yet if one lacks either of these qualities, a good guardian he never can be. But these requirements resemble impossibilities, and so the result is that a good guardian is impossible." "It seems likely," he said. And I was at a standstill, and after reconsidering what we had been saying, I said, "We deserve to be at a loss, my friend, for we have lost sight of the comparison that we set before ourselves.^b" "What do you mean?" "We failed to note that there are after all such natures as we thought impossible, endowed with these opposite qualities." "Where?" "It may be observed in other animals, but especially in that which we likened to the guardian. You surely have observed in well-bred hounds that their natural disposition is to be most gentle to their familiars and those whom they recognize, but the contrary to those whom they do not know." "I am aware of that." "The thing is possible, then," said I, "and it is not an unnatural requirement that we are looking for in our guardian." "It seems not."

XVI. "And does it seem to you that our guardian-to-be will also need, in addition to the being high-spirited, the further quality of having the love of wisdom in his nature?" "How so?" he said; "I don't apprehend your meaning." "This too," said I, "is something that you will discover in dogs and which is worth our wonder in the creature." "What?" "That the sight of an unknown person angers him before he has suffered any injury, but an acquaintance he will fawn upon though he has never received any kindness from him. Have you never marvelled at that?" "I never paid any attention to the matter before now, but that he acts in some such way is obvious." "But surely that is an exquisite trait of his nature and one that shows a true love of wisdom.^a" "In what respect, pray?" "In respect," said I, "that he distinguishes a friendly from a hostile aspect by nothing save his apprehension of the one and his failure to recognize the other. How, I ask you,^b can the love of learning be denied to a creature whose criterion of the friendly and the alien is intelligence and ignorance?" "It certainly cannot," he said. "But you will admit," said I, "that the love of learning and the love of wisdom are the same?" "The same," he said. "Then may we not confidently lay it down in the case of man too, that if he is to be in some sort gentle to friends and familiars he must be by nature a lover of wisdom and of learning?" "Let us so assume," he replied. "The love of wisdom, then, and high spirit and quickness and strength will be combined for us in the nature of him who is to be a good and true guardian of the state." "By all means," he said. "Such, then," I said, "would be the basis^c of his character. But the rearing of and others assume that Plato is satirizing the Cynics, but who were the Cynics in 380-370 B.C.?"

these men and their education, how shall we manage that? And will the consideration of this topic advance us in any way towards discerning what is the object of our entire inquiry—the origin of justice and injustice in a state—our aim must be to omit nothing of a sufficient discussion, and yet not to draw it out to tiresome length?" And Glaucon's brother replied, "Certainly, I expect that this inquiry will bring us nearer to that end." "Certainly, then, my dear Adeimantus," said I, "we must not abandon it even if it prove to be rather long." "No, we must not." "Come, then, just as if we were telling stories or fables^a and had ample leisure,^b let us educate these men in our discourse." "So we must."

XVII. "What, then, is our education?^c Or is it hard to find a better than that which long time has discovered?^d Which is, I suppose, gymnastics for the body^e and for the soul music." "It is." "And shall we not begin education in music earlier than in gymnastics?" "Ofcourse." "And under music you include tales, do you not?" "I do." "And tales are of two species, the one true and the other false?" "Yes." "And education must make use of both, but first of the false^f?" "I don't understand your meaning." "By no manner of means will we allow it." "We must begin, then, it seems, by a censorship over our story-makers, and what they do well we must pass and what not, reject. And the stories on the accepted list we will induce nurses and mothers to tell to the children and so shape their souls by these stories far rather than their bodies by their hands. But most of the stories they now tell we must reject." "What sort of stories?" he said. "The example of the greater stories," I said, "will show us the lesser also. For surely the pattern must be the same and the greater and the less must have a like tendency. Don't you think so?" "I do," he said; "but I that we must not admit into our city either wrought in allegory^a or without allegory. For the young are not able to distinguish what is and what is not allegory, but whatever opinions are taken into the mind at that age are wont to prove indelible and unalterable. For which reason, maybe, we should do our utmost that the first stories that they hear should be so composed as to bring the fairest lessons of virtue to their ears."

XVIII. "Yes, that is reasonable," he said; "but if again someone should ask us to be specific and say what these compositions may be and what are the tales, what could we name?" And I replied, "Adeimantus, we are not poets,^b you and I at present, but founders of a state. And to founders it pertains to know the patterns on which poets must compose their fables and from which their poems must not be allowed to deviate; but the founders are not required themselves to compose fables." "Right," he said; "but this very thing—the patterns or norms of right speech about the gods, what would they be?" "Something like this," I said. "The true quality of God we must always surely attribute to him whether we compose in epic, melic, or tragic verse." "We must." "And is not God of course^c good in reality and always to be spoken of^d as such?" "Certainly." "But further, no good thing is harmful, is it?" "I think not." "Can what is not harmful

Below τὸ ἀγαθόν, followed by οὐδ' ἄρα . . . ὁ θεός, is in itself a refutation of the ontological identification in Plato of God and the Idea of Good. But the essential goodness of God is a commonplace of liberal and philosophical theology, from the Stoics to Whittier's hymn, "The Eternal Goodness."

The idea, elaborated in Cleanthes' hymn to Zeus, may be traced back to the speech of the Homeric Zeus in Od. i. 33 ἐξ ἡμεῶν γάρ φασι κάκ' ἔμμεναι. "Once more, is the good beneficent?" "Yes." "It is the cause, then, of welfare?" "Yes." "Then the good is not the cause of all things, but of things that are well it is the cause—of things that are ill it is blameless." "Entirely so," he said. "Neither, then, could God," said I, "since he is good, be, as the multitude say, the cause of all things, but for mankind he is the cause of few things, but of many things not the cause.^a For good things are far fewer^b with us than evil, and for the good we must assume no other cause than God, but the cause of evil we must look for in other things and not in God." "What you say seems to me most true," he replied. "Then," said I, "we must not accept from Homer or any other poet the folly of such error as this about the gods when he says^c—

Two urns stand on the floor of the palace of Zeus and

^a The line is not found in Homer, nor does Plato explicitly say that it is. Zeus is dispenser of war in Il. iv. 84.

^b Il. iv. 69 ff.

^c ἔριν τε καὶ κρίσιν is used in Menex. 237 c of the contest of the gods for Attica. Here it is generally taken of the theomachy, Il. xx. 1-74, which begins with the summons of the gods to a council by Themis at the command of Zeus. It has also been understood, rather improbably, of the judgment of Paris.

but if any poets compose a 'Sorrows of Niobe,' the poem that contains these iambs, or a tale of the Pelopidae or of Troy, or anything else of the kind, we must either forbid them to say that these woes are the work of God, or they must devise some such interpretation as we now require, and must declare that what God did was righteous and good, and they were benefited^e by their chastisement. But that they were miserable who paid the penalty, and that the doer of this was God, is a thing that the poet must not be suffered to say; if on the other hand he should say that for needing chastisement the wicked were miserable and that in paying the penalty they were benefited by God, that we must allow. becomes the cause of evil to anyone, we must contend in every way that neither should anyone assert this in his own city if it is to be well governed, nor anyone hear it, neither younger nor older, neither telling a story in metre or without metre; for neither would the saying of such things, if they are said, be holy, nor would they be profitable to us or concordant with themselves." "I cast my vote with yours for this law," he said, "and am well pleased with it." "This, then," said I, "will be one of the laws and patterns concerning the gods^a to which speakers and poets will be required to conform, that God is not the cause of all things, but only of the good." "And an entirely satisfactory one," he said. "And what of this, the second. Do you think that God is a wizard and capable of manifesting himself by design, now in one aspect, now in another, at one time^b himself changing and altering his shape in many transformations and at another deceiving us and causing us to believe such things about him; or that he is simple and less likely than anything else to depart from his own form?" "I cannot say offhand," he replied. "But what of this: If anything went out from^c its own form, would it not be displaced and changed, either by itself or by something else?" "Necessarily." "Quite so," he said. "But surely it would be most wholly right, as I was just now saying, to describe this as in very truth falsehood—ignorance namely in the soul of the man deceived. For the falsehood in words is a copy^a of the affection in the soul, an after-rising image of it and not an altogether unmixed falsehood. Is not that so?" "By all means."

XXI. "Essential falsehood, then, is hated not only by gods but by men." "I agree." "But what of the falsehood in words, when and for whom is it serviceable so as not to merit abhorrence? Will it not be against enemies? And when any of those whom we call friends owing to madness or folly attempts to do some wrong, does it not then become useful to avert the evil—as a medicine? And also in the fables of which we were just now speaking owing to our ignorance of the truth about antiquity, we liken the false to the true as far as we may and so make it edifying.^b" "We most certainly do," he said. "Tell me, then, on which of these grounds falsehood would be serviceable to God. ἐπιγυρομένους παιδεύει, Isoc. xii. 149 and Livy's Preface. For χρήσιμον cf. Politicus 274 E. "That was our view and I believe it right." "What then of this? If they are to be brave, must we not extend our prescription to include also the sayings that will make them least likely to fear death? Or do you suppose that anyone could ever become brave who had that dread in his heart?" "No indeed, I do not," he replied. "By no means." "Then it seems we must exercise supervision^c also, in the matter of such tales as these, over those who undertake to supply them and request them not to dispraise in this indiscriminating fashion the life in Hades but rather praise it, since what they now tell us is neither true nor edifying to men who are destined to be warriors." ^a In 563 E Plato generalizes this psychological principle.

^b This laughter of the Homeric gods has been endlessly commented upon. Hegel allegorizes it. Mrs. Browning ("Aurora Leigh") says:

And all true poets laugh unquenchably
Like Shakespeare and the gods.

Proclus, In Rempub. i. 127 Kroll, says that it is an expression of the abundance of the divine energy. It is a commonplace repeated by George Eliot that the primitive sense of humour ordinarily when one abandons himself to violent laughter his condition provokes a violent reaction.^a”

“I think so,” he said. “Then if anyone represents men of worth as overpowered by laughter we must not accept it, much less if gods.” “Much indeed,” he replied. “Then we must not accept from Homer such sayings as these either about the gods :

—we must not accept it on your view.^c” “If it pleases you to call it mine,” he said; “at any rate we must not accept it.” “But further we must surely prize truth most highly. For if we were right in what we were just saying and falsehood is in very deed useless to gods, but to men useful as a remedy or form of medicine,^d it is obvious that such a thing must be assigned to physicians, and laymen should have nothing to do with it.” “Obviously,” he replied. “The rulers then of the city may, if anybody, fitly lie on account of enemies or citizens for the benefit^e of the state; no others may have anything to do with it, but for a layman to lie to rulers of that kind we shall affirm to be as great a sin, nay a greater, than it is for a patient not to tell his physician or an athlete his trainer the truth of the Homeric gods laughs at the personal deformity of Hephaestus, but they really laugh at his officiousness and the contrast he presents to Hebe. "Then, as regards men that speech must be of this kind, that is a point that we will agree upon when we have discovered the nature of justice and the proof that it is profitable to its possessor whether he does or does not appear to be just." "Most true," he replied.

VI. "So this concludes the topic of tales.^a That of diction, I take it, is to be considered next. So we shall have completely examined both the matter and the manner of speech." And Adeimantus said, "I don't understand what you mean by this." "Well," said I, "we must have you understand. Perhaps you will be more likely to apprehend it thus. Is not everything that is said by fabulists or poets a narration of past, present, or future things?" "What else could it be?" he said. "Do not they proceed^b either by pure narration or by a narrative that is effected through imitation,^c or by both?" "This too," he said, "I still need to have made plainer." "I seem to be a ridiculous and obscure teacher,^a” I said; “so like men who are unable to express themselves I won’t try to speak in wholes^b and universals but will separate off a particular part and by the example of that try to show you my meaning. Tell me. Do you know the first lines of the Iliad in which the poet says that Chryses implored Agamemnon to release his daughter, and that the king was angry and that Chryses, failing of his request, imprecated curses on the Achaeans in his prayers to the god?” “I do.” “You know then that as far as these verses, the poet himself is the speaker and does not even attempt to suggest to us that anyone but himself is speaking. But what follows he delivers as if he were himself Chryses and tries as far as may be to make us feel that not Homer is the speaker, but the priest, an old man. And in this manner he has carried on nearly all the rest of his narration about affairs in Ilion, all that happened in Ithaca, and the entire Odyssey.” “Quite so,” he said. “Now, it is narration, is it not, both when he presents the several speeches and the matter between the speeches?” “Of course.” “But when he delivers a speech as if he were someone else, shall we not say that he then assimilates thereby his own diction as far as possible to that of the person whom he general terms. Cf. Locke, Human Understanding, iii. 10. 27: “This man is hindered in his discourse for want of words to communicate his complex ideas, which he is therefore forced to make known by an enumeration of the simple ones that compose them.”

But Plato here complicates the matter further by sometimes using imitation in the narrower sense of dramatic dialogue as opposed to narration. An attentive reader will easily observe these distinctions. Aristotle's Poetics makes much use of the ideas and the terminology of the following pages.

announces as about to speak?" "We shall obviously." "And is not likening one's self to another in speech or bodily bearing an imitation of him to whom one likens one's self?" "Surely." "In such case then, it appears, he and the other poets effect their narration through imitation." "Certainly." "But if the poet should conceal himself nowhere, then his entire poetizing and narration would have been accomplished without imitation.^a And lest you may say again that you don't understand, I will explain to you how this would be done. If Homer, after telling us that Chryses came with the ransom of his daughter and as a suppliant of the Achaeans but chiefly of the kings, had gone on speaking not as if made or being Chryses ^b but still as Homer, you are aware that it would not be imitation but narration, pure and simple. It would have been somewhat in this wise. I will state it without metre for I am not a poet: ^c the priest came and prayed that to them the gods should grant to take Troy and come safely home, but that they should accept the ransom and release his daughter, out of reverence for the god; and when he had thus spoken the others were of reverent mind and approved, but Agamemnon was angry and bade him depart and not come again lest the sceptre and the fillets of the god should not avail him. And ere his daughter should be released, he said, she would grow old in Argos with himself, and he ordered him to be off and not vex him if he wished to get home safe. And the old man on hearing this was frightened and departed in silence, and having gone apart from the camp he prayed at length to Apollo, invoking the appellations of the god, and reminding him of and asking requital for any of his gifts that had found favour whether in the building of temples or the sacrifice of victims. In return for these things he prayed that the Achaeans should suffer for his tears by the god's shafts. It is in this way, my dear fellow," I said, "that without imitation simple narration results." "I understand," he said.

VII. "Understand then," said I, "that the opposite of this arises when one removes the words of the poet between and leaves the alternation of speeches." "This too I understand," he said, "—it is what happens in tragedy." "You have conceived me most rightly," I said, "and now I think I can make plain to you what I was unable to before, that there is one kind of poetry and tale-telling which works wholly through imitation, as you remarked, tragedy and comedy; and another which employs the recital of the poet himself, best exemplified, I presume, in the dithyramb^a; and there is again that which employs both, in epic poetry and in many other places, if you apprehend me." "I understand now," he said, "what you then meant." "Recall then also the preceding statement that we were done with the 'what' of speech and still had to consider the 'how.' " "I remember." "What I meant then was just this, that we must reach a decision whether we are to suffer our poets to narrate as imitators or in part as imitators and in part not, and what sort of things in each case, or not allow them to imitate^a at all.” “I divine,” he said, “that you are considering whether we shall admit tragedy and comedy into our city or not.” “Perhaps,” said I, “and perhaps even more than that.^b For I certainly do not yet know myself, but whithersoever the wind, as it were, of the argument blows,^c there lies our course.” “Well said,” he replied. “This then, Adeimantus, is the point we must keep in view, do we wish our guardians to be good mimics or not? Or is this also a consequence of what we said before, that each one could practise well only one pursuit and not many, but if he attempted the latter, dabbling in many things, he would fail of distinction in all?” “Of course it is.” “And does not the same rule hold for imitation, that the same man is not able to imitate many things well as he can one?” “No, he is not.” “Still less, then, will he be able to combine the practice of any worthy pursuit with the imitation of many things and the quality of a mimic; since, unless I mistake, the same men cannot practise well at once even the two forms of imitation that appear most nearly akin, as the writing of tragedy and comedy^d? Did you not just now call these two imitations?” “I did, and you are right in saying that the same men are not able to succeed in both, nor yet to be at once good rhapsodists^e and actors.” “True. But neither can the same men

Here, however, it is used broadly to designate the type of elaborate Greek lyric which like the odes of Pindar and Bacchylides narrates a myth or legend with little if any dialogue.

^b This seems to imply that Plato already had in mind the extension of the discussion in the tenth book to the whole question of the moral effect of poetry and art.

^a At the close of the Symposium Socrates constrains Agathon and Aristophanes to admit that one who has the science (τέχνη) of writing tragedy will also be able to write comedy. There is for Plato no contradiction, since poetry is for him not a science or art, but an inspiration.

prove good men, being men, to play the parts of women and imitate a woman young or old wrangling with her husband, defying heaven, loudly boasting, fortunate in her own conceit, or involved in misfortune and possessed by grief and lamentation—still less a woman that is sick, in love, or in labour.”

“Most certainly not,” he replied. “Nor may they imitate slaves, female and male, doing the offices of slaves.” “No, not that either.” “Nor yet, as it seems, bad men who are cowards and who do the opposite of the things we just now spoke of, reviling and lampooning one another, speaking foul words in their cups or when sober and in other ways sinning against themselves and others in word and deed after the fashion of such men. And I take it they must not form the habit of likening themselves to madmen either in words nor yet in deeds. For while knowledge they must have^a both of mad and bad men and women, they must do and imitate nothing of this kind.” “Most true,” he said. “What of this?”

I said, “—are they to imitate smiths and other craftsmen or the rowers of triremes and those who call the time to them or other things connected therewith?” “How could they,” he said, “since it will be forbidden them even to pay any attention to such things?” “Well, then, neighing horses^b and lowing bulls, and the noise of rivers and the roar of the sea and the thunder and everything of that kind—will they imitate these?” “Nay, looms, the hissing of locomotives; often the wild, restless tumult of streets, the humming and rumbling of dense masses of the people” (Stefan Zweig). So another modern critic celebrates “the cry of the baby in a Strauss symphony, the sneers and snarls of the critics in his Helden Leben, the contortions of the Dragon in Wagner’s Siegfried.”

they have been forbidden," he said, "to be mad or liken themselves to madmen." "If, then, I understand your meaning," said I, "there is a form of diction and narrative in which the really good and true man would narrate anything that he had to say, and another form unlike this to which the man of the opposite birth and breeding would cleave and in which he would tell his story." "What are these forms?" he said. "A man of the right sort, I think, when he comes in the course of his narrative to some word or act of a good man will be willing to impersonate the other in reporting it, and will feel no shame at that kind of mimicry, by preference imitating the good man when he acts steadfastly and sensibly, and less and more reluctantly when he is upset by sickness or love or drunkenness or any other mishap. But when he comes to someone unworthy of himself, he will not wish to liken himself in earnest to one who is inferior,^a except in the few cases where he is doing something good, but will be embarrassed both because he is unpractised in the mimicry of such characters, and also because he shrinks in distaste from moulding and fitting himself to the types of baser things. His mind disdains them, unless it be for jest.^b" "Naturally," he said.

IX. "Then the narrative that he will employ will be of the kind that we just now illustrated by the verses of Homer, and his diction will be one that partakes of both, of imitation and simple narration, but there will be a small portion of imitation in a long discourse—or is there nothing in what I say?" "Yes, indeed,"^a he said, "that is the type and pattern of such a speaker." "Then," said I, "the other kind of speaker, the more debased he is the less will he shrink from imitating anything and everything. He will think nothing unworthy of himself, so that he will attempt, seriously and in the presence of many,^b to imitate all things, including those we just now mentioned—claps of thunder, and the noise of wind and hail and axles and pulleys, and the notes of trumpets and flutes and pan-pipes, and the sounds of all instruments, and the cries of dogs, sheep, and birds; and so his style will depend wholly on imitation in voice and gesture, or will contain but a little of pure narration." "That too follows of necessity," he said. "These, then," said I, "were the two types of diction of which I was speaking." "There are those two," he replied. "Now does not one of the two involve slight variations,^c and if we assign a suitable pitch and rhythm to the diction, is not the result that the right speaker speaks almost on the same note and in one cadence—for the changes are slight—and similarly in a rhythm of nearly the same kind?" "Quite so." "But what of the other type? Does it not require the opposite, every kind of pitch and all rhythms, if it too is to have appropriate expression, since it involves manifold forms of variation?" "Emphatically so." "And do all poets and speakers hit upon one type or the other of diction or some blend which they combine of both?" "They must," he said. "What, then," said I, "are we to do? Shall we admit all of these into the city, or one of the unmixed types, or the mixed type?" "If my vote prevails," he said, "the unmixed imitator of the good." "Nay, but the mixed type also is pleasing, Adeimantus, and far most pleasing to boys and their tutors and the great mob is the opposite of your choice." "Most pleasing it is." "But perhaps," said I, "you would affirm it to be ill-suited to our polity, because there is no twofold or manifold man^a among us, since every man does one thing." "It is not suited." "And is this not the reason why such a city is the only one in which we shall find the cobbler a cobbler and not a pilot in addition to his cobbling, and the farmer a farmer and not a judge added to his farming, and the soldier a soldier and not a money-maker in addition to his soldiery, and so of all the rest?" "True," he said. "^b If a man, then, it seems, who was capable by his cunning of assuming every kind of shape and imitating all things should arrive in our city, bringing with himself^c the poems which he wished to exhibit, we should fall down and worship him as a holy and wondrous and delightful creature, but should say to him that there is no man of that kind among us in our city, nor is it lawful for such a man to arise among us, and we should send him away to another city, after pouring myrrh down over his head and crowning him with fillets of wool, but we ourselves, for our souls' good, should continue to employ the more austere^a and less delightful poet and tale-teller, who would imitate the diction of the good man and would tell his tale in the patterns which we prescribed in the beginning,^b when we set out to educate our soldiers." "We certainly should do that if it rested with us." "And now, my friend," said I, "we may say that we have completely finished the part of music that concerns speeches and tales. For we have set forth what is to be said and how it is to be said." "I think so too," he replied.

X. "After this, then," said I, "comes the manner of song and tunes?" "Obviously." "And having gone thus far, could not everybody discover what we must say of their character in order to conform to what has already been said?" "I am afraid that 'everybody' does not include me," laughed Glaucon^c; "I cannot sufficiently divine off-hand what we ought to say, though I have a suspicion." "You certainly, I presume," said I, "have a sufficient understanding of this—that the song^d is composed of three things, the words, the tune, and the rhythm?" "Yes," said he, "that much." ^a The poets at first composed their own music to fit the words. When, with the further development of music, there arose the practice of distorting the words, as in a mere libretto, it provoked a storm of protest from conservatives in aesthetics and morals.

conformity to the patterns and manner that we have prescribed?" "True," he said. "And again, the music and the rhythm must follow the speech.^a" "Of course." "But we said we did not require dirges and lamentations in words." "We do not." "What, then, are the dirge-like modes of music? Tell me, for you are a musician." "The mixed Lydian,^b" he said, "and the tense or higher Lydian, and similar modes." "These, then," said I, "we must do away with. For they are useless even to women^c who are to make the best of themselves, let alone to men." "Assuredly." "But again, drunkenness is a thing most unbecoming guardians, and so is softness and sloth." "Yes." "What, then, are the soft and convivial modes?" "There are certain Ionian and also Lydian modes that are called lax." "Will you make any use of them for warriors?" "None at all," he said; "but it would seem that you have left the Dorian and the Phrygian." "I don't know^d the musical modes," I said, "but leave us that mode^e that would fittingly imitate the utterances and the and modes of feeling, as Ruskin and many others have in our day. The hard-headed Epicureans and sceptics denied it, as well as the moral significance of music generally.

^a Modern psychologists are still debating the question.

^b The Platonic Socrates frequently refers to Damon as his musical expert. Cf. Laches 200 B, infra 424 C, Alc. I. 118 C.

^c There is a hint of satire in this disclaimer of expert knowledge. Cf. 399 A. There is no agreement among modern experts with regard to the precise form of the so-called enoplios. tell. But which are imitations of which sort of life, I am unable to say.^a "Well," said I, "on this point we will take counsel with Damon,^b too, as to which are the feet appropriate to illiberality, and insolence or madness or other evils, and what rhythms we must leave for their opposites; and I believe I have heard him obscurely speaking^c of a foot that he called the enoplios, a composite foot, and a dactyl and an heroic^d foot, which he arranged, I know not how, to be equal up and down^e in the interchange of long and short,^f and unless I am mistaken he used the term iambic, and there was another foot that he called the trochaic, and he added the quantities long and short. And in some of these, I believe, he censured and commended the tempo of the foot no less than the rhythm itself, or else some combination of the two; I can't say. But, as I said, let this matter be postponed for Damon's consideration. For to determine the truth of these would require no little discourse. Do you think otherwise?" "No, by heaven, I do not." "But this you are able to determine—that seemliness and unseemliness are attendant upon the good rhythm and the bad." "Of course." "And, further,^g that good rhythm and ^g Plato, as often, employs the forms of an argument proceeding by minute links to accumulate synonyms in illustration of a moral or aesthetic analogy. He is working up to the Wordsworthian thought that order, harmony, and beauty in nature and art are akin to these qualities in the soul.

"They certainly must follow the speech," he said. "And what of the manner of the diction, and the speech?" said I. "Do they not follow and conform to the disposition of the soul?" "Of course." "And all the rest to the diction?" "Yes." "Good speech, then, good accord, and good grace, and good rhythm wait upon a good disposition, not that weakness of head which we euphemistically style goodness of heart, but the truly good and fair disposition of the character and the mind.^a" "By all means," he said. "And must not our youth pursue these everywhere^b if they are to do what it is truly theirs to do^c?" "They must indeed." "And there is surely much of these qualities in painting and in all similar craftsmanship^d—weaving is full of them and embroidery and architecture and likewise the manufacture of household furnishings and thereto the natural bodies of animals and plants as well. For in all these there is grace or gracelessness. And gracelessness and evil rhythm and disharmony are akin to evil speaking and the evil temper, but the opposites are the symbols and the architecture (oikodōmia), which Butcher (Aristotle's Theory of Poetry, p. 138) says is ignored by Plato and Aristotle.

XII. “Is it, then, only the poets that we must supervise and compel to embody in their poems the semblance of the good character or else not write poetry among us, or must we keep watch over the other craftsmen, and forbid them to represent the evil disposition, the licentious, the illiberal, the graceless, either in the likeness of living creatures or in buildings or in any other product of their art, on penalty, if unable to obey, of being forbidden to practise their art among us, that our guardians may not be bred among symbols of evil, as it were in a pasturage of poisonous herbs, lest grazing freely and cropping from many such day by day they little by little and all unawares accumulate and build up a huge mass of evil in their own souls. But we must look for those craftsmen who by the happy gift of nature are capable of following the trail of true beauty and grace, that our young men, dwelling as it were in a salubrious region, may receive benefit from all things about them, whence the influence that emanates from works of beauty may waft itself to eye or ear like a breeze that brings from wholesome places health, and so from earliest childhood insensibly guide them to likeness, to friendship, to harmony with beautiful reason.” “Yes,” he said, “that would be far the best education for them.” “And is it not for this reason, Glaucon,” said I, “that education in music is most sovereign,^a because more than anything else

^a Schopenhauer, following Plato, adds the further metaphysical reason that while the other arts imitate the external manifestations of the universal Will, music represents the Will itself.

^b Cf. Laws 653 B-C, where Plato defines education by this principle. Aristotle virtually accepts it (Ethics ii. 3. 2). The Stoics somewhat pedantically laid it down that reason entered into the youth at the age of fourteen.

^c Plato often employs letters or elements (στοιχεῖα) to rhythm and harmony find their way to the inmost soul and take strongest hold upon it, bringing with them and imparting grace, if one is rightly trained, and otherwise the contrary? And further, because omissions and the failure of beauty in things badly made or grown would be most quickly perceived by one who was properly educated in music, and so, feeling distaste^a rightly, he would praise beautiful things and take delight in them and receive them into his soul to foster its growth and become himself beautiful and good. The ugly he would rightly disapprove of and hate while still young and yet unable to apprehend the reason, but when reason came^b the man thus nurtured would be the first to give her welcome, for by this affinity he would know her." "I certainly think," he said, "that such is the cause of education in music." "It is, then," said I, "as it was when we learned our letters^c and felt that we knew them sufficiently only when the separate letters did not elude us, appearing as few elements in all the combinations that convey them, and when we did not disregard them in small things or great^d and think it unnecessary to recognize them, but were eager to distinguish them everywhere, in the belief that we should never be literate and letter-perfect till we could do this." "True." "And is ^a It is of course possible to contrast images with the things themselves, and to speak of forms or species without explicit allusion to the metaphysical doctrine of ideas. But on the other hand there is not the slightest reason to assume that the doctrine and its terminology were not familiar to Plato at the time when this part of the Republic was written. Cf. Unity of Plato's Thought, pp. 31 ff., 35. Statistics of the uses of εἶδος and ἰδέα (Peiper's Ontologica Platonica, Taylor, Varia Socratica, Wilamowitz, Platon, ii. pp. 249-253), whatever their philological interest, contribute nothing to the interpretation of Plato's thought. Cf. my De Platonis Idearum Doctrina, pp. 1, 30, and Class. Phil. vol. vi. pp. 363-364.

There is for common sense no contradiction or problem in the fact that Plato here says that we cannot be true "musicians" till we recognize both the forms and all copies of, or approximations to, them in art or nature, while in Book X. (601) he argues that the poet and artist copy not the idea but its copy in the material world.

it not also true that if there are any likenesses ^a of letters reflected in water or mirrors, we shall never know them until we know the originals, but such knowledge belongs to the same art and discipline ^b ? ” “ By all means. ” “ Then, by heaven, am I not right in saying that by the same token we shall never be true musicians, either—neither we nor the guardians that we have undertaken to educate—until we are able to recognize the forms of soberness, courage, liberality, ^c and high-mindedness and all their kindred and their opposites, too, in all the combinations that contain and convey them, and to apprehend them and their images wherever found, disregarding them neither in trifles nor in great things, but believing the knowledge of them to belong to the same art and discipline ? ” “ The conclusion is inevitable, ” he said. “ Then, ” said I, “ when there is a coincidence ^d of a beautiful disposition in the soul and corresponding and harmonious beauties of the same type in the bodily form—is not this the fairest spectacle for one who is capable of its contemplation ^e ? ”

^b Plato, like all intellectuals, habitually assumes that knowledge of principles helps practice. Cf. Phaedr. 259 E, 262 B, and infra 484 D, 520 C, 540 A.

^c Liberality and high-mindedness, or rather, perhaps, magnificence, are among the virtues defined in Aristotle's list (Eth. Nic. 1107 b 17), but are not among the four cardinal virtues which the Republic will use in Book IV. in the comparison of the individual with the state.

^e Music and beauty lead to the philosophy of love, more fully set forth in the Phaedrus and Symposium, and here dismissed in a page. Plato's practical conclusion here may be summed up in the Virgilian line (Aen. v. 344):

Gratior et pulchro veniens in corpore virtus.

"Far the fairest." "And surely the fairest is the most lovable." "Of course." "The true musician, then, would love by preference persons of this sort; but if there were disharmony he would not love this." "No," he said, "not if there was a defect in the soul; but if it were in the body he would bear with it and still be willing to bestow his love." "I understand," I said, "that you have or have had favourites of this sort and I grant your distinction. But tell me this—can there be any communion between soberness and extravagant pleasure?" "How could there be," he said, "since such pleasure puts a man beside himself no less than pain?" "Or between it and virtue generally?" "By no means." "But is there between pleasure and insolence and licence?" "Most assuredly." "Do you know of greater or keener pleasure than that associated with Aphrodite?" "I don't," he said, "nor yet of any more insane." "But is not the right love a sober and harmonious love of the orderly and the beautiful?" "It is indeed," said he. "Then nothing of madness, nothing akin to licence, must be allowed to come nigh the right love?" "No." "Then this kind of pleasure may not come nigh, nor may lover and beloved who rightly love and are loved have anything to do with it?" "No, by heaven, Socrates," he said, "it must not come nigh them." "Thus, then, as it seems, you will lay down the law in the city that we are founding, that the lover may kiss^b and pass the time with and touch the beloved as a father would a son, for honourable ends, if he persuade him. But otherwise he must so associate with the objects of his care that there should never be any suspicion of anything further, on penalty of being stigmatized for want of taste and true musical culture." "Even so," he said. "Do you not agree, then, that our discourse on music has come to an end? It has certainly made a fitting end, for surely the end and consummation of culture is the love of the beautiful." "I concur," he said.

XIII. "After music our youth are to be educated by gymnastics?" "Certainly." "In this too they must be carefully trained from boyhood through life, and the way of it is this, I believe; but consider it yourself too. For I, for my part, do not believe that a sound body by its excellence makes the soul good, but on the contrary that a good soul by its virtue renders the body the best that is possible.^a What is your opinion?" "I think so too." "Then if we should sufficiently train the mind and turn over to it the minutiae of the care of the body, and content ourselves with merely indicating the norms or patterns, not to make a long story of it, we should be acting rightly?" "By all means." "From intoxication^b we said that they must abstain. For a guardian is surely the last person in the world to whom it is allowable to get drunk and not know where on earth he is." "Yes," he said, "it would be absurd that a guardian^c should need a guard." "What next about their food? These men are athletes in the greatest of contests,^a are they not?" "Yes." "Is, then, the bodily habit of the athletes we see about us suitable for such?" "Perhaps." "Nay," said I, "that is a drowsy habit and precarious for health. Don't you observe that they sleep away their lives,^b and that if they depart ever so little from their prescribed regimen these athletes are liable to great and violent diseases?" "I do." "Then," said I, "we need some more ingenious form of training for our athletes of war, since these must be as it were sleepless hounds, and have the keenest possible perceptions of sight and hearing, and in their campaigns undergo many changes^c in their drinking water, their food, and in exposure to the heat of the sun and to storms,^d without disturbance of their health." "I think so." "Would not, then, the best gymnastics be akin to the music that we were just now describing?" "What do you mean?" "It would be a simple and flexible^e gymnastic, and especially so in the training for war." "In what way?" "One could learn that," said I, "even from Homer.^f For you are aware that in the banqueting of the heroes on campaign he does not feast them on fish,^g though they are at the sea-side on the Hellespont,^h nor on boiled meat, but only on roast, which is rule. Adam is mistaken in saying that ἐπιεικής is practically synonymous with ἀγαθή. It sometimes is, but not here. Cf. Plutarch, De san. 13 ἀκριβής . . . καὶ δι' ὄνυχος.

what soldiers could most easily procure. For everywhere, one may say, it is of easier provision to use the bare fire than to convey pots and pans ^a along." "Indeed it is." "Neither, as I believe, does Homer ever make mention of sweetmeats. Is not that something which all men in training understand—that if one is to keep his body in good condition he must abstain from such things altogether?" "They are right," he said, "in that they know it and do abstain." "Then, my friend, if you think this is the right way, you apparently do not approve of a Syracusan table ^b and Sicilian variety of made dishes." "I think not." "You would frown, then, on a little Corinthian maid as the chère amie of men who were to keep themselves fit?" "Most certainly." "And also on the seeming delights of Attic pastry?" "Inevitably." "In general, I take it, if we likened that kind of food and regimen to music and song expressed in the pan-harmonic mode and in every variety of rhythm it would be a fair comparison." "Quite so." "And there variety engendered licentiousness, did it not, but here disease? While simplicity in music begets sobriety in the souls, and in gymnastic training it begets health in bodies." "Most true," he said. "And when licentiousness and disease multiply in a city, are not many courts of law and dispensaries opened, and the arts of chicane ^c and medicine give themselves airs when even free men in great numbers take them very seriously?" "How can they help it?" he said.

XIV. "Will you be able to find a surer proof of an evil and shameful state of education in a city than the necessity of first-rate physicians and judges, not only for the base and mechanical, but for those who claim to have been bred in the fashion of free men? Do you not think it disgraceful and a notable mark of bad breeding to have to make use of a justice imported from others, who thus become your masters and judges, from lack of such qualities in yourself^a?" "The most shameful thing in the world." "Is it?" said I, "or is this still more shameful^b—when a man not only wears out the better part of his days in the courts of law as defendant or accuser, but from the lack of all true sense of values^c is led to plume himself on this very thing, as being a smart fellow to 'put over' an unjust act and cunningly to try every dodge and practice,^d every evasion, and wriggle^e out of every hold in defeating justice, and that too for trifles and worthless things, because he does not know how much nobler and better it is to arrange his life so as to have no need^f of a nodding juryman?" "That is," said he, "still more shameful than the other." "And to require medicine," said I, "not merely for wounds or the incidence of some seasonal maladies, but, because of sloth and such a regimen as we described, to fill one's body up with winds and humours like a insensitiveness to the καλόν of the banausic, the nouveau riche and the Philistine.

^a Plato ridicules the unsavoury metaphors required to describe the effects of auto-intoxication. There is a similar bit of somewhat heavier satire in Spencer's Social Statics, 1868, p. 32: "Carbuncled noses, cadaverous faces, foetid breaths, and plethoric bodies meet us at every turn; and our condolences are perpetually asked for headaches, flatulences, nightmare, heartburn, and endless other dyspeptic symptoms."

^b Plato is probably quoting from memory. In our text, Il. xi. 624, Hecamede gives the draught to Machaon and Nestor as the Ion (538 b) correctly states.

I infer this from the fact that at Troy his sons did not find fault with the damsel who gave to the wounded Eurypylus ^b to drink a posset of Pramnian wine plentifully sprinkled with barley and gratings of cheese, inflammatory ingredients of a surety, nor did they censure Patroclus, who was in charge of the case.” “It was indeed,” said he, “a strange potion for a man in that condition.” “Not so strange,” said I, “if you reflect that the former Asclepiads made no use of our modern coddling ^c medication of diseases before the time of Herodicus. But Herodicus ^d was a trainer and became a valetudinarian, and blended gymnastics and medicine, for the torment first and chiefly of himself and then of many successors.” “How so?” he said. “By lingering out his death,” said I; “for living in perpetual observance of his malady, which was incurable, he was not able to effect a cure, but lived through his days unfit for the business of life, suffering the tortures of the damned if he departed a whit Macaulay on Mitford's History of Greece: "It (oligarchical government) has a sort of valetudinarian longevity; it lives in the balance of Sanctiorius; it takes no exercise; it exposes itself to no accident; it is seized with a hypochondriac alarm at every new sensation; it trembles at every breath; it lets blood for every inflammation; and thus, without ever enjoying a day of health or pleasure, drags out its existence to a dotting and debilitated old age." That Macaulay here is consciously paraphrasing Plato is apparent from his unfair use of the Platonic passage in his essay on Bacon. from his fixed regimen, and struggling against death by reason of his science he won the prize of a doting old age.^a "A noble prize^b indeed for his science," he said. "The appropriate one," said I, "for a man who did not know that it was not from ignorance or inacquaintance with this type of medicine that Aesculapius did not discover it to his descendants, but because he knew that for all well-governed peoples there is a work assigned to each man in the city which he must perform, and no one has leisure to be sick^c and doctor himself all his days. And this we absurdly enough perceive in the case of a craftsman, but don't see in the case of the rich and so-called fortunate." "How so?" he said.

illness and neglect of the work that lies before him isn't worth living. And thereupon he bids farewell to that kind of physician, enters upon his customary way of life, regains his health, and lives attending to his affairs—or, if his body is not equal to the strain, he dies and is freed from all his troubles.^a ”

“ For such a man,” he said, “ that appears to be the right use of medicine.” “ And is not the reason,” I said, “ that he had a task and that life wasn't worth acceptance on condition of not doing his work ? ”

“ Obviously,” he said. “ But the rich man, we say, has no such appointed task, the necessity of abstaining from which renders life intolerable.” “ I haven't heard of any.” “ Why, haven't you heard that saying of Phocylides,^b that after a man has ‘ made his pile ’ he ought to practise virtue ? ”

“ Before, too, I fancy,” he said. “ Let us not quarrel with him on that point,” I said, “ but inform ourselves whether this virtue is something for the rich man to practise, and life is intolerable if he does not, or whether we are to suppose that while valetudinarianism is a hindrance to single-minded attention to carpentry and the other arts, it is no obstacle to the fulfilment of Phocylides' exhortation.”

“ Yes, indeed,” he said, “ this excessive care for the body that goes beyond simple gymnastics^c is about the greatest of all obstacles. For it is troublesome in household affairs and military service and sedentary offices in the city.”

“ And, chief of all, it puts difficulties in the way of any kind of instruction, thinking, or private meditation, forever imagining headaches^a and dizziness and attributing their origin to philosophy. So that wherever this kind of virtue is practised^b and tested it is in every way a hindrance.^c For it makes the man always fancy himself sick and never cease from anguishing about his body." "Naturally," he said. "Then shall we not say that it was because Asclepius knew this—that for those who were by nature and course of life sound of body but had some localized disease, that for such, I say, and for this habit he revealed the art of medicine, and, driving out their disease by drugs and surgery, prescribed for them their customary regimen in order not to interfere with their civic duties, but that, when bodies were diseased inwardly and throughout, he did not attempt by diet and by gradual evacuations and infusions to prolong a wretched existence for the man and have him beget in all likelihood similar wretched offspring? But if a man was incapable of living in the established round^d and order of life, he did not think it worth while to treat him, since such a fellow is of no use either to himself or to the state." "A most politic Asclepius you're telling us of," he said. "Obviously," said I,

They sucked the blood, and soothing simples sprinkled?^b But what he was to eat or drink thereafter they no more prescribed than for Eurypylus, taking it for granted that the remedies sufficed to heal men who before their wounds were healthy and temperate in diet even if they did happen for the nonce to drink a posset; but they thought that the life of a man constitutionally sickly and intemperate was of no use to himself or others, and that the art of medicine should not be for such nor should they be given treatment even if they were richer than Midas.^c" "Very ingenious fellows," he said, "you make out these sons of Asclepius to be."

XVI. "Tis fitting," said I; "and yet in disregard of our principles the tragedians and Pindar^d affirm that Asclepius, though he was the son of Apollo, was bribed by gold to heal a man already at the point of death, and that for this cause he was struck by the lightning. But we in accordance with the aforesaid principles^e refuse to believe both statements, but if he was the son of a god he was not avaricious, we will insist, and if he was greedy of gain he was not the son of a god." "That much," said he, "is most certainly true. But what have you to say to this, Socrates, must we not have good physicians in our city? And they would be the most likely to be good who had treated the greatest number of healthy and diseased men, and so good judges would be those who had associated with all sorts and conditions of men." "Most assuredly I want them good," I said; "but do you know whom I regard as such?" "I'll know if you tell,^a" he said. "Well, I will try," said I. "You, however, have put unlike cases in one question." "How so?" said he. "Physicians, it is true," I said, "would prove most skilled if, from childhood up, in addition to learning the principles of the art they had familiarized themselves with the greatest possible number of the most sickly bodies, and if they themselves had suffered all diseases and were not of very healthy constitution. For you see they do not treat the body by the body.^b If they did, it would not be allowable for their bodies to be or to have been in evil condition. But they treat the body with the mind—and it is not competent for a mind that is or has been evil to treat anything well." "Right," he said. "But a judge, mark you, my friend, rules soul with soul and it is not allowable for a soul to have been bred from youth up among evil souls and to have grown familiar with them, and itself to have run the gauntlet of every kind of wrong-doing and injustice so as quickly to infer from itself the misdeeds of others as it might diseases in the body, but it must have been inexperienced in evil natures and uncontaminated by them while young, if it is to be truly fair and good and judge soundly of justice. For which cause the better sort seem to be simple-minded in youth and are easily deceived by the wicked, since they do not have within themselves patterns answering to the affections of the bad." "That is indeed their experience," he said. "Therefore it is," said I, " that the good judge must not be a youth but an old man, a late learner^a of the nature of injustice, one who has not become aware of it as a property in his own soul, but one who has through the long years trained himself to understand it as an alien thing in alien souls, and to discern how great an evil it is by the instrument of mere knowledge and not by experience of his own." " That at any rate," he said, " appears to be the noblest kind of judge." " And what is more, a good one," I said, " which was the gist of your question. For he who has a good soul is good. But that cunning fellow quick to suspect evil,^b and who has himself done many unjust acts and who thinks himself a smart trickster, when he associates with his like does appear to be clever, being on his guard and fixing his eyes on the patterns within himself. But when the time comes for him to mingle with the good and his elders, then on the contrary he appears stupid. He is unseasonably distrustful and he cannot recognize a sound character because he has no such pattern in himself. But since he more often meets with the bad than the good, he seems to himself and to others to be rather wise than foolish." " That is quite true," he said.

XVII. " Well then," said I, " such a one must not be our ideal of the good and wise judge but the former. For while badness could never come to know both virtue and itself, native virtue through education will at last acquire the science of both itself and badness.^c

^a Cf. George Eliot, Adam Bede, chap. xiv.: " It is our habit to say that while the lower nature can never understand the higher, the higher nature commands a complete view of the lower. But I think the higher nature has to learn this comprehension by a good deal of hard experience."

This one, then, as I think, is the man who proves to be wise and not the bad man.^a” “And I concur,” he said. “Then will you not establish by law in your city such an art of medicine as we have described in conjunction with this kind of justice? And these arts will care for the bodies and souls of such of your citizens as are truly well born, but of those who are not, such as are defective in body they will suffer to die and those who are evil-natured and incurable^b in soul they will themselves^c put to death.” “This certainly,” he said, “has been shown to be the best thing for the sufferers themselves and for the state.” “And so your youths,” said I, “employing that simple music which we said engendered sobriety will, it is clear, guard themselves against falling into the need of the justice of the court-room.” “Yes,” he said. “And will not our musician, pursuing the same trail in his use of gymnastics, if he please, get to have no need of medicine save when indispensable^d?” “I think so.” “And even the exercises and toils of gymnastics he will undertake with a view to the spirited part of his nature^e to arouse that rather than for mere strength, unlike ordinary athletes, who treat^f diet and exercise only as a means to muscle.” “Nothing could be truer,” he said. “Then may we not say, Glaucon,” said I,

“ that those who established ^a an education in music and gymnastics had not the purpose in view that some attribute to them in so instituting, namely to treat the body by one and the soul by the other ? ”

“ But what ? ” he said. “ It seems likely,” I said, “ that they ordained both chiefly for the soul’s sake.”

“ How so ? ” “ Have you not observed,” said I, “ the effect on the disposition of the mind itself ^b of lifelong devotion to gymnastics with total neglect of music ? Or the disposition of those of the opposite habit ? ” “ In what respect do you mean ? ” he said.

“ In respect of savagery and hardness or, on the other hand, of softness and gentleness ? ” “ I have observed,” he said, “ that the devotees of unmitigated gymnastics turn out more brutal than they should be and those of music softer than is good for them.”

“ And surely,” said I, “ this savagery is a quality derived from the high-spirited element in our nature, which, if rightly trained, becomes brave, but if overstrained, would naturally become hard and harsh.”

“ I think so,” he said. “ And again, is not the gentleness a quality which the philosophic nature would yield ? This if relaxed too far would be softer than is desirable but if rightly trained gentle and orderly ? ”

“ That is so.” “ But our requirement, we say, ^c is that the guardians should possess both natures.”

“ It is.” “ And must they not be harmoniously adjusted to one another ? ” “ Of course.” “ And the soul of the man thus attuned is sober and brave ? ” become more brave and bold than he was ? ” “ He does indeed.” “ But what if he does nothing but this and has no contact with the Muse in any way, is not the result that even if there was some principle of the love of knowledge in his soul, since it tastes of no instruction nor of any inquiry and does not participate in any discussion or any other form of culture, it becomes feeble, deaf, and blind, because it is not aroused or fed nor are its perceptions purified and quickened ? ” “ That is so,” he said. “ And so such a man, I take it, becomes a misologist^a and a stranger to the Muses. He no longer makes any use of persuasion by speech but achieves all his ends like a beast by violence and savagery, and in his brute ignorance and ineptitude lives a life of disharmony and gracelessness.” “ That is entirely true,” he said. “ For these two, then, it seems there are two arts which I would say some god gave to mankind, music and gymnastics for the service of the high-spirited principle and the love of knowledge in them—not for the soul and the body except incidentally, but for the harmonious adjustment of these two principles by the proper degree of tension and relaxation of each.” “ Yes, so it appears,” he said. “ Then he who best blends gymnastics with music and applies them most suitably to the soul is the man whom we should most rightly pronounce to be the most perfect and harmonious musician, far rather than the one who brings the strings into unison with one another.^b ” “ That seems likely,

For why^b should one recite the list of the dances of such citizens, their hunts and chases with hounds, their athletic contests and races? It is pretty plain that they must conform to these principles and there is no longer any difficulty in discovering them." "There is, it may be, no difficulty," he said. "Very well," said I; "what, then, have we next to determine? Is it not which ones among them^c shall be the rulers and the ruled?" "Certainly." "That the rulers must be the elder and the ruled the younger is obvious." "It is." "And that the rulers must be their best?" "This too." "And do not the best of the farmers prove the best farmers?" "Yes." "And in this case, since we want them to be the best of the guardians, must they not be the best guardians, the most regardful of the state?" "Yes." "They must then to begin with be intelligent in such matters and capable, and furthermore careful^d of the interests of the state?" "That is so." "But one would be most likely to be careful of that which he loved." "Necessarily." "And again, one would be most likely to love that whose interests he supposed to coincide with his own, and thought that when it prospered he too would prosper and if not, the contrary." "So it is," he said. "Then we must pick out from the other guardians such men as to our observation appear most inclined through the entire course of their lives to be zealous to do what they think for the interest of the state, and who would be least likely to consent to do the opposite." "That would be a suitable choice," he said. "I think, then, we shall have to observe them at every period of life, to see if they are conservators and guardians of this conviction in their minds and never by sorcery nor by force can be brought to expel^a from their souls unawares this conviction that they must do what is best for the state." "What do you mean by the 'expelling'?" he said. "I will tell you, said I; "it seems to me that the exit of a belief from the mind is either voluntary or involuntary. Voluntary is the departure of the false belief from one who learns better, involuntary that of every true belief." "The voluntary," he said, "I understand, but I need instruction about the involuntary." "How now," said I, "don't you agree with me in thinking that men are unwillingly deprived of good things but willingly of evil? Or is it not an evil to be deceived in respect of the truth and a good to possess truth? And don't you think that to opine the things that are is to possess the truth?" "Why, yes," said he, "you are right, and I agree that men are unwillingly deprived of true opinions.^b" "And doesn't this happen to them by theft, by the spells of sorcery or by force?" "I don't understand now either," he said. "I must be talking in high tragic style,^c" I said; "by those who have their opinions stolen from them I mean those who are over-persuaded and those who forget, because in the one case time, in the other argument strips them unawares of their beliefs. "That too I understand and you are right." "And the victims of sorcery^b I am sure you too would say are they who alter their opinions under the spell of pleasure or terrified by some fear." "Yes," he said: "everything that deceives appears to cast a spell upon the mind."

"Well then, as I was just saying, we must look for those who are the best guardians of the indwelling conviction that what they have to do is what they at any time believe to be best for the state. Then we must observe them from childhood up and propose for them tasks in which one would be most likely to forget this principle or be deceived, and he whose memory is sure and who cannot be beguiled we must accept and the other kind we must cross off from our list. Is not that so?" "Yes." "And again we must subject them to toils and pains and competitions in which we have to watch for the same traits." "Right," he said. "Then," said I, "must we not institute a third kind of competitive test with regard to sorcery and observe them in that? Just as men conduct colts to noises and uproar to see if they are liable to take fright, so we must bring these lads while young into fears and again pass them into pleasures, testing them much more carefully than men do gold in the fire, to see if the man remains immune to such witchcraft and preserves his com-

And he who as boy, lad, and man endures the test and issues from it unspoiled we must establish as ruler over our city and its guardian, and bestow rewards upon him in life, and in death the allotment of the supreme honours of burial-rites and other memorials. But the man of the other type we must reject. Such," said I, "appears to me, Glaucon, the general notion of our selection and appointment of rulers and guardians as sketched in outline, but not drawn out in detail." "I too," he said, "think much the same." "Then would it not truly be most proper to designate these as guardians in the full sense of the word, watchers against foemen without and friends within, so that the latter shall not wish and the former shall not be able to work harm, but to name those youths whom we were calling guardians just now, helpers and aids for the decrees of the rulers?" "I think so," he replied.

XXI. "How, then," said I, "might we contrive ^a one of those opportune falsehoods ^b of which we were just now ^c speaking, so as by one noble lie to persuade if possible the rulers themselves, but failing that the rest of the city?" "What kind of a fiction do you mean?" said he. "Nothing unprecedented," said

^a As was the Cadmus legend of the men who sprang from the dragon's teeth, which the Greeks believed οὕτως ἀπίθανον εἶναι. Laws 663 E. Pater, who translates the passage (Plato and Platonism, p. 223), fancifully suggests that it is a "miners' story." Others read into it an allusion to Egyptian castes. The proverb ψεύσμα Φοινικικόν (Strabo 259 B) probably goes back to the Phoenician tales of the Odyssey.

"You act like one who shrinks from telling his thought," he said. "You will think that I have right good reason^c for shrinking when I have told," I said. "Say on," said he, "and don't be afraid." "Very well, I will. And yet I hardly know how to find the audacity or the words to speak and undertake to persuade first the rulers themselves and the soldiers and then the rest of the city, that in good sooth^d all our training and educating of them were things that they imagined and that happened to them as it were in a dream; but that in reality at that time they were down within the earth being moulded and fostered themselves while their weapons and the rest of their equipment were being fashioned. And when they were quite finished the earth as being their mother^e delivered them, and now as if their land were their mother and their nurse often disclaims responsibility for the tale. Plato's fancy of men reared beneath the earth is the basis of Bulwer-Lytton's Utopia, The Coming Race, as his use of the ring of Gyges (359 D-360 B) is of H. G. Wells' Invisible Man.

they ought to take thought for her and defend her against any attack and regard the other citizens as their brothers and children of the self-same earth." "It is not for nothing,^a" he said, "that you were so bashful about coming out with your lie." "It was quite natural that I should be," I said; "but all the same hear the rest of the story. While all of you in the city are brothers, we will say in our tale, yet God in fashioning those of you who are fitted to hold rule mingled gold in their generation,^b for which reason they are the most precious—but in the helpers silver, and iron and brass in the farmers and other craftsmen. And as you are all akin, though for the most part you will breed after your kinds,^c it may sometimes happen that a golden father would beget a silver son and that a golden offspring would come from a silver sire and that the rest would in like manner be born of one another. The securing of disinterested capacity in the rulers is the pons asinorum of political theory. Plato constructs his whole state for this end. Cf. Introd. p. xv. Aristotle, Pol. 1262 b 27, raises the obvious objection that the transference from class to class will not be an easy matter. But Plato here and in 423 D-E is merely stating emphatically the postulates of an ideal state. He admits that even if established it will some time break down, and that the causes of its failure will lie beyond human ken, and can only be expressed in symbol. See on 546-547.

^c Plato repeats the thought that since the mass of men metals in the souls of their offspring, and if sons are born to them with an infusion of brass or iron they shall by no means give way to pity in their treatment of them, but shall assign to each the status due to his nature and thrust them out^a among the artizans or the farmers. And again, if from these there is born a son with unexpected gold or silver in his composition they shall honour such and bid them go up higher, some to the office of guardian, some to the assistanceship, alleging that there is an oracle^b that the state shall then be overthrown when the man of iron or brass is its guardian. Do you see any way of getting them to believe this tale?" "No, not these themselves," he said, "but I do, their sons and successors and the rest of mankind who come after."^c "Well," said I, "even that would have a good effect in making them more inclined to care for the state and one another. For I think I apprehend your meaning. XXII. And this shall fall out as tradition^d guides."

"But let us arm these sons of earth and conduct them under the leadership of their rulers. And when they have arrived they must look out for the fairest site in the city for their encampment,^e a position from which they could best hold down rebellion against the laws from within and repel aggression from without as of a wolf against the fold. "And these must be of a character to keep out the cold in winter and be sufficient in summer?" "Of course. For I presume you are speaking of their houses." "Yes," said I, "the houses of soldiers^b not of money-makers." "What distinction do you intend by that?" he said. "I will try to tell you," I said. "It is surely the most monstrous and shameful thing in the world for shepherds to breed the dogs who are to help them with their flocks in such wise and of such a nature that from indiscipline or hunger or some other evil condition the dogs themselves shall attack the sheep and injure them and be likened to wolves^c instead of dogs." "A terrible thing, indeed," he said. "Must we not then guard by every means in our power against our helpers treating the citizens in any such way and, because they are the stronger, converting themselves from benign assistants into savage masters?" "We must," he said. "And would they not have been provided with the chief safeguard if their education has really been a good one?" "But it surely has," he said. "In addition, moreover, to such an education a thoughtful man would affirm that their houses and the possessions provided for them ought to be such as not to interfere with the best performance of their own work as guardians and not to incite them to wrong the other citizens." "He will rightly affirm that." "Consider then," said I, "whether, if that is to be their character, their habitations and ways of life must not be something after this fashion. In the first place, none must possess any private property ^a save the indispensable. Secondly, none must have any habitation or treasure-house which is not open for all to enter at will. Gold and silver, we will tell them, they have of the divine quality from the gods always in their souls, and they have no need of the metal of men nor does holiness suffer them to mingle and contaminate that heavenly possession with the acquisition of mortal gold, since many impious deeds have been done about the coin of the multitude, while that which dwells within them is unsullied. The captious objection is repeated by Aristotle, Pol. 1264 b 15 ff., though he later (1325 a 9-10) himself uses Plato's answer to it, and by moderns, as Herbert Spencer, Grote, Newman to some extent (Introduction to Aristotle's Politics, p. 69), and Zeller (Aristotle, ii. p. 224) who has the audacity to say that "Plato demanded the abolition of all private possession and the suppression of all individual interests because it is only

BOOK IV

I. AND Adeimantus broke in and said, "What will be your defence, Socrates, if anyone objects that you are not making these men very happy,^a and that through their own fault? For the city really belongs to them and yet they get no enjoyment out of it as ordinary men do by owning lands and building fine big houses and providing them with suitable furniture and winning the favour of the gods by private sacrifices^b and entertaining guests and enjoying too those possessions which you just now spoke of, gold and silver and all that is customary for those who are expecting to be happy? But they seem, one might say, to be established in idleness in the city, exactly like hired mercenaries, with nothing to do but keep guard." "Yes," said I, "and what is in the Idea or Universal that he acknowledges any title to true reality." Leslie Stephen does not diverge so far from Plato when he says (Science of Ethics, p. 397): "The virtuous men may be the very salt of the earth, and yet the discharge of a function socially necessary may involve their own misery." By the happiness of the whole Plato obviously means not an abstraction but the concrete whole of which Leslie Stephen is thinking. But from a higher point of view Plato eloquently argues (465 B-C) that duty fulfilled will yield truer happiness to the guardians than seeking their own advantage in the lower sense of the word.

These and many similar counts of the indictment you are omitting." "Well," said he, "assume these counts too."^c "What then will be our apology you ask?" "Yes." "By following the same path I think we shall find what to reply. For we shall say that while it would not surprise us if these men thus living prove to be the most happy, yet the object on which we fixed our eyes in the establishment of our state was not the exceptional happiness of any one class but the greatest possible happiness of the city as a whole. For we thought^d that in a state so constituted we should be most likely to discover justice as we should injustice in the worst governed state, and that when we had made these out we could pass judgement on the issue of our long inquiry. Our first task then, we take it, is to mould the model of a happy state—we are not isolating^e a small class in it and postulating their happiness, but that of the city as a whole. But the opposite type of state we will consider presently.^f It is as if we were colouring a statue and someone approached and censured us, saying that we did not apply the most beautiful pigments to the most beautiful parts of the image, since the eyes,^a which are the most beautiful part, have not been painted with purple but with black—we should think it a reasonable justification to reply, ‘Don’t expect us, quaint friend, to paint the eyes so fine that they will not be like eyes at all, nor the other parts, but observe whether by assigning what is proper to each we render the whole beautiful.’^b And so in the present case you must not require us to attach to the guardians a happiness that will make them anything but guardians. For in like manner we could^c clothe the farmers in robes of state and deck them with gold and bid them cultivate the soil at their pleasure, and we could make the potters recline on couches from left to right^d before the fire drinking toasts and feasting with their wheel alongside to potter with when they are so disposed, and we can make all the others happy in the same fashion, so that thus the entire city may be happy. But urge us not to this, since, if we yield, the farmer will not be a farmer nor the potter a potter, nor will any other of the types that constitute a state keep its form. However, for the others it matters less. For cobblers^e who deteriorate and are

^a Note the “ab urbe condita” construction. For the thought cf. 374 B. Zeller and many who follow him are not justified in inferring that Plato would not educate the masses. (Cf. Newman, Introduction to Aristotle’s Politics, i. p. 160.) It might as well be argued that the high schools of the United States are not intended for the masses because some people sometimes emphasize their function of “fitting for college.” In the Republic Plato describes secondary education as a preparation for the higher training. The secondary education of the entire citizenry in the Laws marks no change of opinion (Laws 818 ff.). Cf. Intro. p. xxxiii.

^a The expression is loose, but the meaning is plain. The principle "one man, one task" makes the guardians real guardians. The assumption that their happiness is the end is incompatible with the very idea of a state. Cf. Introd. pp. xxix f. ἐστιάτορας recalls μέλλοντα ἐστιάσεσθαι 345 c, but we are expected to think also of the farmers of 420 e.

spoiled and pretend to be the workmen that they are not are no great danger to a state. But guardians of laws and of the city who are not what they pretend to be, but only seem, destroy utterly, I would have you note, the entire state, and on the other hand, they alone are decisive of its good government and happiness. If then we are forming true guardians and keepers of our liberties, men least likely to harm the commonwealth, but the proponent of the other ideal is thinking of farmers and 'happy' feasters as it were in a festival and not in a civic community, he would have something else in mind^a than a state. Consider, then, whether our aim in establishing the guardians is the greatest possible happiness among them or whether that is something we must look to see develop in the city as a whole, but these helpers and guardians are to be constrained and persuaded to do what will make them the best craftsmen in their own work, and similarly all the rest. And so, as the entire city develops and is ordered well, each class is to be left to the share of happiness that its nature comports."

"How so?" "Thus! do you think a potter who grew rich would any longer be willing to give his mind to his craft?" "By no means," said he. "But will he become more idle and negligent than he was?" "Far more." "Then he becomes a worse potter?" "Far worse too." "And yet again, if from poverty he is unable to provide himself with tools and other requirements of his art, the work that he turns out will be worse, and he will also make inferior workmen of his sons or any others whom he teaches." "Of course." "From both causes, then, poverty and wealth, the products of the arts deteriorate, and so do the artisans?" "So it appears." "Here, then, is a second group of things, it seems, that our guardians must guard against and do all in their power to keep from slipping into the city without their knowledge." "What are they?" "Wealth and poverty," said I, "since the one brings luxury, idleness and innovation, and the other illiberality and the evil of bad workmanship in addition to innovation." "Assuredly," he said; "yet here is a point for your consideration, Socrates, how our city, possessing no wealth, will be able to wage war, especially if compelled to fight a large and wealthy state." "Obviously," said I, "it would be rather difficult to fight one such, but easier to fight two.^a" "What did you mean by that?" he said. "Tell me first," I said, "whether, if they have to fight, they will not be fighting as athletes of war^b against men of wealth?" "Yes, that is true," he said.

"Not even," said I, "if he were allowed to retreat^a and then turn and strike the one who came up first, and if he repeated the procedure many times under a burning and stifling sun? Would not such a fighter down even a number of such opponents?" "Doubtless," he said; "it wouldn't be surprising if he did." "Well, don't you think that the rich have more of the skill and practice^b of boxing than of the art of war?" "I do," he said. "It will be easy, then, for our athletes in all probability to fight with double and triple their number." "I shall have to concede the point," he said, "for I believe you are right." "Well then, if they send an embassy to the other city and say what is in fact true^c: 'We make no use of gold and silver nor is it lawful for us but it is for you: do you then join us in the war and keep the spoils of the enemy,'^d—do you suppose any who heard such a proposal would choose to fight against hard and wiry hounds rather than with the aid of the hounds against fat and tender sheep?" "I think not. Yet consider whether the accumulation of all the wealth of other cities in one does not involve danger for the state that has no wealth." "What happy innocence," said I, "to suppose that you can properly use the name city of any other than the one we are constructing." "Why, what should we say?" he said. " must be applied to the others. For they are each one of them many cities, not a city, as it goes in the game.^a There are two at the least at enmity with one another, the city of the rich and the city of the poor,^b and in each of these there are many. If you deal with them as one you will altogether miss the mark, but if you treat them as a multiplicity by offering to the one faction the property, the power, the very persons of the other, you will continue always to have few enemies and many allies. And so long as your city is governed soberly in the order just laid down, it will be the greatest of cities. I do not mean greatest in repute, but in reality, even though it have only a thousand^c defenders. For a city of this size that is really one^d you will not easily discover either among Greeks or barbarians—but of those that seem so you will find many and many times the size of this. Or do you think otherwise? " " No, indeed I don't," said he.

"That behest will perhaps be an easy^b one for them," he said. "And still easier,^b haply," I said, "is this that we mentioned before^c when we said that if a degenerate offspring was born to the guardians he must be sent away to the other classes, and likewise if a superior to the others he must be enrolled among the guardians; and the purport of all this was^d that the other citizens too must be sent to the task for which their natures were fitted, one man to one work, in order that each of them fulfilling his own function may be not many men, but one, and so the entire city may come to be not a multiplicity but a unity."^e "Why yes," he said, "this is even more trifling than that." "These are not, my good Adeimantus, as one might suppose, numerous and difficult injunctions that we are imposing upon them, but they are all easy, provided they guard, as the saying is, the one great thing^f—or instead of great let us call it sufficient."^g "What is that?" he said. dealings, and from these relations it proceeds against the laws and the constitution with wanton licence, Socrates, till finally it overthrows^a all things public and private." "Well," said I, "are these things so?" "I think so," he said. "Then, as we were saying^b in the beginning, our youth must join in a more law-abiding play, since, if play grows lawless and the children likewise, it is impossible that they should grow up to be men of serious temper and lawful spirit." "Of course," he said. "And so we may reason that when children in their earliest play are imbued with the spirit of law and order through their music, the opposite of the former supposition happens—this spirit waits upon them in all things and fosters their growth, and restores and sets up again whatever was overthrown in the other^c type of state." "True, indeed," he said. "Then such men rediscover for themselves those seemingly trifling conventions which their predecessors abolished altogether." "Of what sort?" "Such things as the becoming silence^d of the young in the presence of their elders; the giving place to them and rising up before them, and dutiful service of parents, and the cut of the hair^e and the garments and the fashion of the foot-gear, and in general the deportment of the body and everything of the kind. Don't you think so?" "I do." "Yet to enact them into laws would, I think, be silly.^f For such laws are not obeyed nor would they last, being enacted only in words and on

Does not like ever summon like?" "Surely." "And the final^a outcome, I presume, we would say is one complete and vigorous product of good or the reverse." "Of course," said he. "For my part, then," I said, "for these reasons I would not go on to try to legislate on such matters."^b "With good reason," said he. "But what, in heaven's name," said I, "about business matters, the deals^c that men make with one another in the agora—and, if you please, contracts with workmen^d and actions for foul language^e and assault, the filing of declarations,^f the impanelling of juries, the payment and exaction of any dues that may be needful in markets or harbours and in general market, police or harbour regulations and the like, can we bring^g ourselves to legislate about these?" "Nay, 'twould not be fitting," he said, "to dictate to good and honourable men.^h For most of the enactments that are needed about these things they will easily, I presume, discover." "Yes, my friend, provided God grants them the preservation of the principles of law that we have for the men? Do you think it possible for a man who does not know how to measure when a multitude of others equally ignorant assure him that he is four cubits tall not to suppose this to be the fact about himself?" "Why no,^a" he said, "I don't think that." "Then don't be harsh with them. For surely such fellows are the most charming spectacle in the world when they enact and amend such laws as we just now described and are perpetually expecting to find a way of putting an end to frauds in business and in the other matters of which I was speaking because they can't see that they are in very truth^b trying to cut off a Hydra's head." "What part of legislation, then," he said, "is still left for us?" And I replied, "For us nothing, but for the Apollo of Delphi, the chief, the fairest and the first of enactments." "What are they?" he said.

^b For the exegete as a special religious functionary at Athens cf. L. & S. s.v. and Laws 759 c-d. Apollo in a higher sense is the interpreter of religion for all mankind. He is technically πατρίως at Athens (Euthydem. 302 p) but he is πάτριος for all Greeks and all men. Plato does not, as Thümser says (p. 301), confuse the Dorian and the Ionian Apollo, but rises above the distinction.

^c Plato prudently or piously leaves the details of ceremonial and institutional religion to Delphi. Cf. 540 b-c, Laws 759 c, 738 b-c, 828 a, 856 e, 865 b, 914 a, 947 d.

For of such matters we neither know anything nor in the founding of our city if we are wise shall we entrust them to any other or make use of any other interpreter^b than the God of our fathers.^c For this God surely is in such matters for all mankind the interpreter of the religion of their fathers who from his seat in the middle and at the very navel^d of the earth delivers his interpretation." "Excellent! said," he replied; "and that is what we must do."

VI. "At last, then, son of Ariston," said I, "your city^e may be considered as established. ^g See on 369 A. Matter-of-fact critics may object that there is no injustice in the perfectly good state. But we know the bad best by the canon of the good. Cf. on 409 A-B. The knowledge of opposites is the same.

Injustice can be defined only in relation to its opposite (444 A-B), and in the final argument the most unjust man and state are set up as the extreme antitypes of the ideal (571-580). By the perfect state Plato does not mean a state in which no individual retains any human imperfections.

It is idle then to speak of "difficulties" or "contradictions" or changes of plan in the composition of the Republic.

Plato recognizes other virtues even in the Republic (supra 402 c ἐλευθεριότης and μεγαλοπρέπεια. Cf. 536 A), and would have been as ready to admit that the number four was a they differ from one another and which of the two he must have who is to be happy, alike ^a whether his condition is known or not known to all gods and men." "Nonsense," said Glaucon, "you ^b promised that you would carry on the search yourself, admitting that it would be impious ^c for you not to come to the aid of justice by every means in your power." "A true reminder," I said, "and I must do so, but you also must lend a hand." "Well," he said, "we will." "I expect then," said I, "that we shall find it in this way. I think our city, if it has been rightly founded, is good in the full sense of the word."^d "Necessarily," he said. "Clearly, then, it will be wise, brave, sober, and just." "Clearly." "Then if we find any of these qualities in it, the remainder ^e will be that which we have not found?" "Surely." "Take the case of any four other things. If we were looking for any one of them in anything and recognized the object of our search first, that would have been enough for us, but if we had recognized the other three first, that in itself would have made known to us the thing we were seeking. For plainly there was nothing part of his literary machinery as Ruskin was to confess the arbitrariness of his Seven Lamps of Architecture.

^e It is pedantry to identify this with Mill's method of residues and then comment on the primitive naïveté of such an application of Logic to ethics. One might as well speak of Andocides' employment of the method (De myst. 109) or of its use by Gorgias in the disjunctive dilemma of the Palamedes 11 and passim, or say that the dog of the anecdote employs it when he sniffs at one trail and immediately runs up the other. Plato obviously employs it merely as a literary device for the presentation of his material under the figure of a search. He, "in the infancy of philosophy," is quite as well aware as his censors can be in the senility of criticism that he is not proving anything by this method, but merely setting forth what he has assumed for other reasons.

^a σοφία is wisdom par excellence. Aristotle, Met. i., traces the history of the idea from Homer to its identification in Aristotle's mind with first philosophy or metaphysics. For Plato, the moralist, it is virtue and the fear of the Lord; for his political theory it is the "political or royal art" which the dramatic dialogues fail to distinguish from the special sciences and arts. Cf. Unity of Plato's Thought, p. 17, n. 97, Protag. 319 A, Euthyd. 282 E, 291 C, Gorg. 501 A-B, etc.

In the unreformed Greek state its counterfeit counterpart is the art of the politician.

In the Republic its reality will be found in the selected guardians who are to receive the higher education, and who alone will apprehend the idea of good, which is not mentioned here simply because Plato, not Krohn, is writing the Republic.

left for it to be but the remainder." "Right," he said. "And so, since these are four, we must conduct the search in the same way." "Clearly." "And, moreover, the first thing that I think I clearly see therein is the wisdom,^a and there is something odd about that, it appears." "What?" said he. "Wise in very deed I think the city that we have described is, for it is well counselled, is it not?" "Yes." "And surely this very thing, good counsel,^b is a form of wisdom. For it is not by ignorance but by knowledge that men counsel well." "Obviously." "But there are many and manifold knowledges or sciences in the city." "Of course." "Is it then owing to the science of her carpenters that a city is to be called wise and well advised?" "By no means for that, but rather mistress of the arts of building." "Then a city is not to be styled wise because of the deliberations^c of the science of wooden utensils for their best production?" "No, I grant you." "Is it, then, because of that of brass implements or any other of that kind?" "None whatsoever," he said. "Nor yet because of the science of the production of crops from the soil, but the name it takes from that

^b Protagoras, like Isocrates, professed to teach εὐβουλία (Protag. 318 E), which Socrates at once identifies with the political art. Plato would accept Protagoras's discrimination of this from the special arts (ibid. 318 E ff.), but he does not believe that such as Protagoras can teach it. His political art is a very different thing from Protagoras's εὐβουλία and is apprehended by a very different education from that offered by Protagoras. Cf. "Plato's Laws and the Unity of Plato's Thought," p. 348, n. 5, Euthydem. 291 B-C, Charm. 170 B, Protag. 319 A, Gorg. 501 A-B, 503 D, Polit. 289 C, 293 D, 309 C.

"Then," said I, "is there any science in the city just founded by us residing in any of its citizens which does not take counsel about some particular thing in the city but about the city as a whole and the betterment of its relations with itself^a and other states?" "Why, yes, there is." "What is it," said I, "and in whom is it found?" "It is the science of guardianship or government and it is to be found in those rulers to whom we just now gave the name of guardians in the full sense of the word." "And what term then do you apply to the city because of this knowledge?" "Well advised," he said, "and truly wise." "Which class, then," said I, "do you suppose will be the more numerous in our city, the smiths or these true guardians?" "The smiths, by far," he said. "And would not these rulers be the smallest of all the groups of those who possess special knowledge and receive distinctive appellations^b?" "By far." "Then it is by virtue of its smallest class and minutest part of itself, and the wisdom that resides therein, in the part which takes the lead and rules, that a city established on principles of nature would be wise as a whole. And as it appears these are by nature the fewest, the class to which it pertains to partake of the knowledge which alone of all forms of knowledge deserves the name of wisdom." "Most true," he said. "This one of our four, then, we have, I know not how, discovered, the thing itself and its place in the state." "I certainly think," said he, "that it has been discovered sufficiently."

And things that are dyed by this process become fast-coloured^c and washing either with or without lyes cannot take away the sheen of their hues. But otherwise you know what happens to them, whether^d anyone dips other colours or even these without the preparatory treatment." "I know," he said, "that they present a ridiculous and washed-out appearance. "By this analogy, then," said I, "you must conceive what we too to the best of our ability were doing when we selected our soldiers and educated them in music^e and exercises of the body. The sole aim of our contrivance was that they should be convinced and receive our laws like a dye as it were, so that their belief and faith might be^f fast-coloured both about the things that are to be feared and all other things because of the fitness of their nature and nurture, and that so their dyes might not be washed out by those lyes

^a δεινά: it is not fanciful to feel the unity of Plato's imagination as well as of his thought in the recurrence of this word in the δεινὰ καὶ ἀναγκαῖα . . . παθήματα of the mortal soul in Tim. 69 c.

^b Cf. Protag. 360 c-d, Laws 632 c, Aristot. Eth. Nic. 1116 b 24. Strictly speaking, Plato would recognize four grades, (1) philosophic bravery, (2) the bravery of the ἐπικούροι here defined, (3) casual civic bravery in ordinary states, (4) animal instinct, which hardly deserves the name. Cf. Laches 196 e, Mill, Nature, p. 47 "Consistent courage is always the effect of cultivation," etc., Unity of Plato's Thought, nn. 46 and 77.

This power in the soul, then, this unfailing conservation of right and lawful belief^b about things to be and not to be feared is what I call and would assume to be courage, unless you have something different to say." "No, nothing," said he; "for I presume that you consider mere right opinion about the same matters not produced by education, that which may manifest itself in a beast or a slave,^c to have little or nothing to do with law^d and that you would call it by another name than courage." "That is most true," said I. "Well then," he said, "I accept this as bravery." "Do so," said I, "and you will be right with the reservation^e that it is the courage of a citizen. Some other time,^f if it please you, we will discuss it more fully. At present we were not seeking this but justice; and for the purpose of that inquiry I believe we have done enough." "You are quite right," he said.

inquiry, justice." "Quite so." "If there were only some way to discover justice so that we need not further concern ourselves about soberness." "Well, I, for my part," he said, "neither know of any such way nor would I wish justice to be discovered first if that means that we are not to go on to the consideration of soberness. But if you desire to please me, consider this before that." "It would certainly be very wrong ^a of me not to desire it," said I. "Go on with the inquiry then," he said. "I must go on," I replied, "and viewed from here it bears more likeness to a kind of concord and harmony than the other virtues did." "How so?" "Soberness is a kind of beautiful order ^b and a continence of certain pleasures and appetites, as they say, using the phrase 'master of himself' I know not how; and there are other similar expressions that as it were point us to the same trail. Is that not so?" "Most certainly." "Now the phrase 'master of himself' is an absurdity, is it not? For he who is master of himself would also be subject to himself, and he who is subject to himself would be master. For the same person is spoken of in all these expressions." "Of course." "But," said I, "the intended meaning of this way of speaking appears to me to be that the soul of a man within him has a better part and a worse part, and the expression self-mastery means the control of the worse by the naturally better part. It is, at any rate, a term of praise. But significance in Plato's definition. As in the case of bravery, Plato distinguishes the temperamental, the bourgeois, the disciplined and the philosophical virtue. But he affects to feel something paradoxical in the very idea of self-control, as perhaps there is. when, because of bad breeding or some association,^a the better part, which is the smaller, is dominated by the multitude^b of the worse, I think that our speech censures this as a reproach,^c and calls the man in this plight unselfcontrolled and licentious." "That seems likely," he said. "Turn your eyes now upon our new city," said I, "and you will find one of these conditions existent in it. For you will say that it is justly spoken of as master of itself if that in which^d the superior rules the inferior is to be called sober and self-mastered." "I do turn my eyes upon it," he said, "and it is as you say." "And again, the mob of motley^e appetites and pleasures and pains one would find chiefly in children^f and women and slaves and in the base rabble of those who are freemen in name.^g" "By all means." "But the simple and moderate appetites which with the aid of reason and right opinion are guided by consideration you will find in few and those the best born and best educated." "True," he said. "And do you not find this too in your city and a domination there of the desires in the multitude and the rabble by the desires and the wisdom that dwell in the minority of the better sort?" "I do," he said.

IX. "If, then, there is any city that deserves to be described as master of its pleasures and desires and self-mastered, this one merits that designation."

Plato, like Shakespeare's Rosalind, brackets boys and women as creatures who have for every passion something and for no passion truly anything.

^a Cf. on 336 A. The ordinary man who is passion's slave is not truly free. The Stoics and Cynics preached many sermons on this text. See Persius, Sat. v. 73 and 124, Epictet. Diss. iv. 1, Xen. Mem. iv. 5. 4, Xen. Oecon. 1. 22-23.

^a Plato is again proceeding by seemingly minute verbal links. Cf. supra 354 A, 379 B, 412 D. καὶ μὴν introduces a further verification of the definition.

^b που marks the slight hesitation at the deviation from the symmetry of the scheme which would lead us to expect, as Aristotle and others have taken it, that σωφροσύνη is the distinctive virtue of the lowest class. It is so practically for the lower sense of σωφροσύνη, but in the higher sense of the willingness of each to fulfil his function in due subordination to the whole, it is common to all classes.

^c Cf. 430 E. Aristotle gives this as an example of (faulty) definition by metaphor (Topics iv. 3. 5).

"Most assuredly," he said. "And is it not also to be called sober^a in all these respects?" "Indeed it is," he said. "And yet again, if there is any city in which the rulers and the ruled are of one mind as to who ought to rule, that condition will be found in this. Don't you think so?" "I most emphatically do," he said. "In which class of the citizens, then, will you say that the virtue of soberness has its seat when this is their condition? In the rulers or in the ruled?" "In both, I suppose,^b" he said. "Do you see then," said I, "that our intuition was not a bad one just now that discerned a likeness between soberness and a kind of harmony^c?" "Why so?" "Because its operation is unlike that of courage and wisdom, which residing in separate parts respectively made the city, the one wise and the other brave. That is not the way of soberness, but it extends literally through the entire gamut^d throughout, bringing about^e the unison in the same chant of the strongest, the weakest and the intermediate, whether in wisdom or, if you please,^f in strength, or for that matter in numbers, wealth, or any similar criterion. So that we should be quite right

^a δὲ ὅλης: sc. τῆς πόλεως, but as ἀτεχνῶς shows (cf. supra on 419 E) it already suggests the musical metaphor of the entire octave διὰ πασῶν.

^c The word order of the following is noteworthy. The translation gives the meaning. ταῦτόν, the object of συν-ἄδοντας, is, by a trait of style that grows more frequent in the Laws and was imitated by Cicero, so placed as to break the monotony of the accusative terminations.

^f For the comparison the kind of superiority is indifferent. See Thompson on Meno 71 E and compare the enumeration of claims to power in the Laws, ἀξιώματα . . . τοῦ ἀρχεῖν, Laws 690 A ff. and infra 434 B.

* The final statement of the definition, which, however, has little significance for Plato's thought, when isolated from its explanatory context. Cf. Def. Plat. 413 E, Unity of Plato's Thought, pp. 15 f., n. 82. Quite idle is the discussion whether σωφροσύνη is otiose, and whether it can be absolutely distinguished from δικαιοσύνη. They are sufficiently distinguished for Plato's purpose in the imagery and analogies of the Republic.

in affirming this unanimity ^a to be soberness, the concord of the naturally superior and inferior as to which ought to rule both in the state and the individual. ^b "I entirely concur," he said. "Very well," said I; "we have made out these three forms in our city to the best of our present judgement. ^c What can be the remaining form that ^d would give the city still another virtue? For it is obvious that the remainder is justice." "Obvious." "Now then, ^e Glaucon, is the time for us like huntsmen ^f to surround the covert and keep close watch that justice may not slip through and get away from us and vanish from our sight. It plainly must be somewhere hereabouts. Keep your eyes open then and do your best to descry it. You may see it before I do and point it out to me." "Would that I could," he said; "but I think rather that if you find in me one who can follow you and discern what you point out to him you will be making a very fair ^g use of me." "Pray ^h for success then," said I, "and follow along with me." "That I will do, only lead on," he said. "And truly," said I, "it appears to be an inaccessible place, lying in deep shadows." "It certainly is a dark covert, not easy to beat up." "But all the same on we must go." "Yes, on." And I caught view and gave a hulloa and said, "Glaucou, I think we have found its trail and I don't believe it will get away from us." "I am glad to hear that," said he. "Truly," said I, "we were slackers^a indeed." "How so?" "Why, all the time, bless your heart, the thing apparently was tumbling about our feet^b from the start and yet we couldn't see it, but were most ludicrous, like people who sometimes hunt for what they hold in their hands.^c So we did not turn our eyes upon it, but looked off into the distance, which was perhaps the reason it escaped us." "What do you mean?" he said. "This," I replied, "that it seems to me that though we were speaking of it and hearing about it all the time we did not understand ourselves^d or realize that we were speaking of it in a sense." "That is a tedious prologue," he said, "for an eager listener."

X. "Listen then," said I, "and learn if there is anything in what I say. For what we laid down in the beginning as a universal requirement when we were founding our city, this I think, or 'some form of this, is justice. And what we did lay down, and often said, if you recall, was that each one man must perform one social service in the state for which his nature was best adapted.'" "Yes, we said that." "And but failed to sustain owing to his inability to distinguish the various possible meanings of the phrase. In the Republic too we have hitherto failed to "learn from ourselves" its true meaning, till now when Socrates begins to perceive that if taken in the higher sense of spiritual division of labour in the soul and in the state, it is the long-sought justice. again that to do one's own business and not to be a busybody is justice, is a saying that we have heard from many and have very often repeated ourselves.^a "We have." "This, then," I said, "my friend, if taken in a certain sense appears to be justice,^b this principle of doing one's own business. Do you know whence I infer this?" "No, but tell me," he said. "I think that this is the remaining virtue in the state after our consideration of soberness, courage, and intelligence, a quality which made it possible for them all to grow up in the body politic and which when they have sprung up preserves them as long as it is present. And I hardly need to remind you that^c we said that justice would be the residue after we had found the other three." "That is an unavoidable conclusion," he said. "But moreover," said I, "if we were required to decide what it is whose indwelling presence will contribute most to making our city good, it would be a difficult decision whether it was the unanimity of rulers and ruled or the conservation in the minds of the soldiers of the convictions produced by law as to what things are or are not to be feared, or the watchful intelligence that resides in the guardians, or whether this is the chief cause of its goodness, the principle embodied in child, woman, slave, free, artisan, ruler, and ruled, that each performed his one task as one man and was not a versatile busybody." "Hard to decide indeed," he said. "A thing, then, that in its contribution to seems somehow to be proving to be this." the excellence of a state vies with and rivals its wisdom, its soberness, its bravery, is this principle of everyone in it doing his own task." "It is indeed," he said. "And is not justice the name you would have to give ^a to the principle that rivals these as conducing to the virtue of state?" "By all means," "Consider it in this wise too ^b if so you will be convinced. Will you not assign the conduct of lawsuits in your state to the rulers?" "Of course." "Will not this be the chief aim of their decisions, that no one shall have what belongs to others ^c or be deprived of his own?" "Nothing else but this." "On the assumption that this is just?" "Yes." "From this point of view too, then, the having ^d and doing of one's own and what belongs to oneself would admittedly be justice." "That is so." "Consider now ^e whether you agree with me. A carpenter undertaking to do the work of a cobbler or a cobbler of a carpenter or their interchange of one another's tools or honours or even the attempt of the same man to do both—the confounding of all other functions would not, think you, greatly injure a state, would it?" "Not much," he said. "But when I fancy one who is by nature an artisan or some kind of money-maker tempted and incited by wealth or command of votes or bodily strength or some similar advantage tries to enter into the class of the soldiers or one of the soldiers into the class of counsellors and guardians, for which he is not fitted, and these inter-

For the ambiguity of τάλλότρια cf. 443 D. So οἰκείον is one's own in either the literal or in the ideal sense of the Stoics and Emerson, and ἐαυτοῦ is similarly ambiguous. Cf. on 443 D.

^b πάλιν, "again," here means conversely. Cf. 425 A. The definition is repeated in terms of the three citizen classes to prepare the way for testing it in relation to the individual soul, which, if the analogy is to hold, must possess three corresponding faculties or parts. The order of words in this and many Platonic sentences is justified by the psychological "investigation," which showed that when the question "which do you like best, apples, pears, or cherries?" was presented in the form "apples, pears, cherries, which do you like best?" the reaction time was appreciably shortened.

change their tools and their honours or when the same man undertakes all these functions at once, then, I take it, you too believe that this kind of substitution and meddlesomeness is the ruin of a state." "By all means." "The interference with one another's business, then, of three existent classes and the substitution of the one for the other is the greatest injury to a state and would most rightly be designated as the thing which chiefly ^a works it harm." "Precisely so." "And the thing that works the greatest harm to one's own state, will you not pronounce to be injustice?" "Of course." "This, then, is injustice.

XI. "Again,^b let us put it in this way. The proper functioning ^c of the money-making class, the helpers and the guardians, each doing its own work in the state, being the reverse of that ^d just described, would be justice and would render the city just." "I think the case is thus and no otherwise," said he. "Let us not yet affirm it quite fixedly,^e" I said, "but if this form ^f when applied to the individual man, is accepted there also as a definition of justice, we will then concede the point—for what else will there be to say? But if not, then we will look for something else. But now let us work out the inquiry in which^a we supposed that, if we found some larger thing that contained justice and viewed it there,^b we should more easily discover its nature in the individual man. And we agreed that this larger thing is the city, and so we constructed the best city in our power, well knowing that in the good^c city it would of course be found. What, then, we thought we saw there we must refer back to the individual and, if it is confirmed, all will be well. But if something different manifests itself in the individual, we will return again to the state and test it there and it may be that, by examining them side by side^d and rubbing them against one another, as it were from the fire-sticks^e we may cause the spark of justice to flash forth,^f and when it is thus revealed confirm it in our own minds.” “Well,” he said, “that seems a sound method^g and that is what we must do.” “Then,” said I, “if you

* ὁ γε ταὐτόν: there are several reasons for the seeming over-elaboration of the logic in the next few pages. The analogy between the three classes in the state and the tripartite soul is an important point in Plato's ethical theory and an essential feature in the structure of the Republic. Very nice distinctions are involved in the attempt to prove the validity of the analogy for the present argument without too flagrant contradiction of the faith elsewhere expressed in the essential unity of the soul. Cf. Unity of Plato's Thought, p. 42. These distinctions in the infancy of logic Plato is obliged to set forth and explain as he proceeds. Moreover, he is interested in logical method for its own sake (cf. Introd. p. xiv), and is here stating for the first time important principles of logic afterwards codified in the treatises of Aristotle.

call a thing by the same^a name whether it is big or little, is it unlike in the way in which it is called the same or like?" "Like," he said. "Then a just man too will not differ^b at all from a just city in respect of the very form of justice, but will be like it." "Yes, like." "But now the city was thought to be just because three natural kinds existing in it performed each its own function, and again it was sober, brave, and wise because of certain other affections and habits^c of these three kinds." "True," he said. "Then, my friend, we shall thus expect the individual also to have these same forms in his soul, and by reason of identical affections of these with those in the city to receive properly the same appellations." "Inevitable," he said. "Goodness gracious," said I, "here is another trifling^d inquiry into which we have plunged, the question whether the soul really contains these three forms in itself or not." "It does not seem to me at all trifling," he said, "for perhaps, Socrates, the saying is true that 'fine things are

The language suggests the theory of ideas. But Plato is not now thinking primarily of that. He is merely repeating in precise logical form the point already made (434 D-E), that the definition of justice in the individual must correspond point for point with that worked out for the state.

^b Cf. 369 A and Meno 72 B. In Phileb. 12 E-13 C, Plato points out that the generic or specific identity does not exclude specific or sub-specific differences.

^c ἕξεις is here almost the Aristotelian ἕξις. Aristotle, Eth. Nic. 1105 b 20, regards πάθη, ἕξεις and δυνάμεις as an exhaustive enumeration of mental states. For δυνάμεις cf. 477 C, Simplic. De An. Hayduck, p. 289 ἀλλὰ τὰ ὦν πρὸς πρακτικὴν ἐδεῖτο ζώην, τὰ τρία μόνον παρελήφεν.

^b τοῦτο by strict grammatical implication means the problem of the tripartite soul, but the reference to this passage in 504 B shows that it includes the whole question of the definition of the virtues, and so ultimately the whole of ethical and political philosophy. We are there told again that the definitions of the fourth book are sufficient for the purpose, but that complete insight can be attained only by relating them to the idea of good. That required a longer and more circuitous way of discipline and training. Plato then does not propose the "longer way" as a method of reasoning which he himself employs to correct the approximations of the present discussion. He merely describes it as the higher education which will enable his philosophical rulers to do that. We may then disregard all idle guesses about a "new logic" hinted at in the longer way, and all fantastic hypotheses about the evolution of Plato's thought and the composition of the Republic based on supposed contradictions between this passage and the later books.

difficult.'^a "Apparently," said I; "and let me tell you, Glaucon, that in my opinion we shall never apprehend this matter^b accurately from such methods as we are now employing in discussion. For there is another longer and harder way that conducts to this. Yet we may perhaps discuss it on the level of our previous statements and inquiries." "May we not acquiesce in that?" he said; "I for my part should be quite satisfied with that for the present." "And I surely should be more than satisfied," I replied. "Don't you weary then," he said, "but go on with the inquiry." "Is it not, then," said I, "impossible for us to avoid admitting^c this much, that the same forms and qualities are to be found in each one of us that are in the state? They could not get there from any other source. It would be absurd to suppose that the element of high spirit was not derived in states from the private citizens who are reputed to have this quality, as the populations of the Thracian and Scythian lands and generally of northern regions ; or the quality of love of knowledge, which would chiefly be attributed to^a the region where we dwell, or the love of money^b which we might say is not least likely to be found in Phoenicians^c and the population of Egypt." "One certainly might," he replied. "This is the fact then," said I, "and there is no difficulty in recognizing it." "Certainly not."

Plato the logician never commits himself to more than is required by the problem under discussion (cf. on 353 c), and Plato the moralist never admits that the ideal has been adequately expressed, but always points to heights beyond. Cf. infra 506 E, 533 A, Phaedo 85 c, Tim. 29 B-c, Soph. 254 c.

^a Plato takes for granted as obvious the general correspondence which some modern philosophers think it necessary to reaffirm. Cf. Mill, Logic, vi. 7. 1 "Human beings in society have no properties, but those which are derived from and may be resolved into the laws and the nature of individual man"; Spencer, Autobiog. ii. p. 543 "Society is created by its units. . . . The nature of its organization is determined by the nature of its units."

Plato illustrates the commonplace in a slight digression on national characteristics, with a hint of the thought partly anticipated by Hippocrates and now identified with Buckle's name, that they are determined by climate and environment. Cf. Newman, Intro. to Aristot. Pol. pp. 318-320.

XII. "But the matter begins to be difficult when you ask whether we do all these things with the same thing or whether there are three things and we do one thing with one and one with another—learn with one part of ourselves, feel anger with another, and with yet a third desire the pleasures of nutrition and generation and their kind, or whether it is with the entire soul^d that we function in each case when we once begin. That is what is really hard to determine properly." "I think so too," he said. "Let us then attempt to define the boundary and decide whether they are identical with one another in this way." "How?" "It is obvious that the same (Eth. Nic. 1102 a 31) to the present day is still a matter of rhetoric, poetry and point of view rather than of strict science. For some purposes we must treat the "faculties" of the mind as distinct entities, for others we must revert to the essential unity of the soul. Cf. Arnold's "Lines on Butler's Sermons" and my remarks in The Assault on Humanism.

Plato himself is well aware of this, and in different dialogues emphasizes the aspect that suits his purpose. There is no contradiction between this passage and Phædo 68 c, 82 c, and Rep. x. 611-12. Cf. Unity of Plato's Thought, pp. 42-43.

"Consider, then, what I am saying." "Say on," he replied. "Is it possible for the same thing at the same time in the same respect to be at rest^e and in motion?" "By no means." "Let us have our understanding still more precise, lest as we proceed we become involved in dispute. If anyone should say of a man standing still but moving his hands and head that the same man is at the same time at rest and in motion we should not, I take it, regard that as the right way of expressing it, but rather that a part^f of him is at rest and a part in motion. ^a The meaning is plain, the alleged rest and motion do not relate to the same parts of the objects. But the syntax of τὰ τοιαῦτα is difficult. Obvious remedies are to expunge the words or to read τῶν τοιούτων, the cacophony of which in the context Plato perhaps rejected at the cost of leaving his syntax to our conjectures.

It may be used to cut short discussion (Unity of Plato's Thought, n. 471) or divert it into another channel. Here, however, he is aware, as Aristotle is, that the maxim of contradiction can be proved only controversially against an adversary who says something (cf. my De Platonis Idearum Doctrina, pp. 7-9, Aristot. Met. 1012 b 1-10); and so, having sufficiently guarded his meaning, he dismisses the subject with the ironical observation that, if the maxim is ever proved false, he will give up all that he bases on the hypothesis of its truth. The Platonic doctrine that opinion, δόξα, is discussion of the soul with herself, or the judgement in which such discussion terminates (cf. Unity of Plato's Thought, p. 47) is here applied to the specific case of the practical reason issuing in an affirmation of the will.

XIII. "Will you not then," said I, "set down as opposed to one another assent and dissent, and the endeavour after a thing to the rejection of it, and embracing to repelling—do not these and all things like these belong to the class of opposite actions or passions; it will make no difference which?^a" "None," said he, "but they are opposites." "What then," said I, "of thirst and hunger and the appetites generally, and again consenting^b and willing, would you not put them all somewhere in the classes just described? Will you not say, for example, that the soul of one who desires either strives for that which he desires or draws towards its embrace what it wishes to accrue to it; or again, in so far as it wills that anything be presented to it, nods assent to itself thereon as if someone put the question,^c striving towards its attainment?" "I would say so," he said. "But what of not-willing^d and not consenting nor yet desiring, shall we not put these under the soul's rejection^e and repulsion from itself and generally into the opposite class from all the former?" "Of course." "This being so, shall we say that the desires constitute a class^a and that the most conspicuous members of that class^b are what we call thirst and hunger?" "We shall," said he. "Is not the one desire of drink, the other of food?" "Yes." "Then in so far as it is thirst, would it be of anything more than that of which we say it is a desire in the soul?"^c I mean is thirst thirst for hot drink or cold or much or little or in a word for a draught of any particular quality, or is it the fact that if heat^d is attached^e to the thirst it would further render the desire—a desire of cold, and if cold of hot? But if owing to the presence of muchness the thirst is much it would render it a thirst for much and if little for little. But mere thirst will never be desire of anything else than that of which it is its nature to be, mere drink,^f and so hunger of food." "That is so," he said; "each desire in itself is of that thing only of which it is its nature to be. The epithets belong to the quality—such or such."^g "Let no one then,"^h said I, "disconcert us when off our guard with the objection that everybody

Plato's generalization of the concepts "attraction" and "repulsion" brings about a curious coincidence with the language of a materialistic, physiological psychology (cf. Lange, History of Materialism, passim), just as his rejection in the Timaeus of attraction and actio in distans allies his physics with that of the most consistent materialists.

^c The argument might proceed with 439 A τοῦ διψῶντος ἄρα ἢ ψυχῇ. All that intervenes is a digression on logic, a caveat against possible misunderstandings of the proposition that thirst qua thirst is a desire for drink only and unqualifiedly. We are especially warned (438 A) against the misconception that since all men desire the good, thirst must be a desire not for mere drink but for good drink. Cf. the dramatic correction of a misconception, Phaedo 79 B, infra 529 A-B.

Cf. "The Origin of the Syllogism," Class. Phil. vol. xix. p. 10. But in the concrete instance heat causes the desire of cool and vice versa. Cf. Phileb. 35 Α ἐπιθυμει τῶν ἐναντίων ἢ πᾶσχει.

If we assume that Plato is here speaking from the point of view of common sense (cf. Lysis 215 Ε τὸ δὲ ψυχρὸν θερμοῦ), there is no need of Hermann's transposition of ψυχροῦ and θερμοῦ, even though we do thereby get a more exact symmetry with πλήθους παρουσίαν . . . τοῦ πολλοῦ below.

^a προσῆ denotes that the "presence" is an addition. Cf. προσείη in Parmen. 149 Ε.

^f Phileb. 35 Α adds a refinement not needed here, that thirst is, strictly speaking, a desire for repletion by drink.

^g Cf. 429 Β. But (the desires) of such or such a (specific) drink are (due to) that added qualification (of the thirst).

^a ἄρα marks the rejection of this reasoning. Cf. supra 358 c, 364 E, 381 E, 499 c. Plato of course is not repudiating his doctrine that all men really will the good, but the logic of this passage requires us to treat the desire of good as a distinct qualification of the mere drink.

^b ὅσα γ' ἐστὶ τοιαῦτα etc.: a palmary example of the concrete simplicity of Greek idiom in the expression of abstract ideas. ὅσα etc. (that is, relative terms) divide by partitive apposition into two classes, τὰ μὲν . . . τὰ δέ. The meaning is that if one term of the relation is qualified, the other must be, but if one term is without qualification, the other also is taken absolutely. Plato, as usual (cf. supra on 347 B), represents the interlocutor as not understanding the first general abstract statement, which he therefore interprets and repeats. I have varied the translation in the repetition desires not drink but good drink and not food but good food, because (the argument will run ^a) all men desire good, and so, if thirst is desire, it would be of good drink or of good whatsoever it is; and so similarly of other desires." "Why," he said, "there perhaps would seem to be something in that objection." "But I need hardly remind you," said I, "that of relative terms those that are somehow qualified are related to a qualified correlate, those that are severally just themselves to a correlate that is just itself.^b" "I don't understand," he said. "Don't you understand," said I, "that the greater ^c is such as to be greater than something?" "Certainly." "Is it not than the less?" "Yes." "But the much greater than the much less. Is that not so?" "Yes." "And may we add the one time greater than the one time less and that which will be greater than that which will be less?" "Surely." "And similarly of the more towards the fewer, and the double towards the half and of all like cases, and again of the heavier towards the lighter, the swifter towards the slower, and yet again of the hot towards the cold and all cases of that kind,^d in order to bring out the full meaning, and some of the differences between Greek and English idiom.

^e The notion of relative terms is familiar. Cf. Charm. 167 E, Theaet. 160 A, Symp. 199 D-E, Parmen. 133 c ff., Sophist 255 D, Aristot. Topics vi. 4, and Cat. v. It is expounded here only to insure the apprehension of the further point that the qualifications of either term of the relation are relative to each other. In the Politicus 283 f. Plato adds that the great and small are measured not only in relation to each other, but by absolute standards. Cf. Unity of Plato's Thought, pp. 61, 62, and infra 531 A.

^a Plato does not wish to complicate his logic with metaphysics. The objective correlate of ἐπιστήμη is a difficult problem. In the highest sense it is the ideas. Cf. Parmen. 134 a.

But the relativity of ἐπιστήμη (Aristot. Top. iv. 1. 5) leads to psychological difficulties in Charm. 168 and to theological in Parmen. 134 c-e, which are waived by this phrase. does not the same hold?" "By all means." "But what of the sciences? Is not the way of it the same? Science which is just that, is of knowledge which is just that, or is of whatsoever^a we must assume the correlate of science to be. But a particular science of a particular kind is of some particular thing of a particular kind. I mean something like this: As there was a science of making a house it differed from other sciences so as to be named architecture." "Certainly." "Was not this by reason of its being of a certain kind^b such as no other of all the rest?" "Yes." "And was it not because it was of something of a certain kind that it itself became a certain kind of science? And similarly of the other arts and sciences?" "That is so."

XIV. "This then," said I, "if haply you now understand, is what you must say I then meant, by the statement that of all things that are such as to be of something, those that are just themselves only are of things just themselves only, but things of a certain kind are of things of a kind. And I don't at all mean^c that they are of the same kind as the things of which they are, so that we are to suppose that the science of health and disease is a healthy and diseased science and that of evil and good, evil and good. I only mean that as science became the science not of just the thing^d of which science is but of some particular kind of thing, a useful study, as opponents of the Classics argue. In Gorg. 476 B this principle is violated by the wilful fallacy that if to do justice is fine, so must it be to suffer justice, but the motive for this is explained in Laws 859-860.

^a αὐτοῦ ὅπερ ἐπιστήμη ἐστίν is here a mere periphrasis for μαθήματος, αὐτοῦ expressing the idea abstract, mere, absolute, or per se, but ὅπερ or ἡπερ ἐστίν is often a synonym of αὐτός or αὐτή in the sense of abstract, absolute, or ideal. Cf. Thompson on Meno 71 B, Sophist 255 D τοῦτο ὅπερ ἐστίν εἶναι.

^a δὴ marks the application of this digression on relativity, for δῖψος is itself a relative term and is what it is in relation to something else, namely drink.

^b τῶν τινὸς εἶναι: If the text is sound, εἶναι seems to be taken twice, (1) with τοῦτο etc., (2) τῶν τινός as predicates. This is perhaps no harsher than τὸ δοκεῖν εἶναι in Aesch. Ag. 788. Cf. Tennyson's

How sweet are looks that ladies bend

On whom their favours fall, and Pope's

And virgins smiled at what they blushed before.

Possibly θήσεις τῶν τινός is incomplete in itself (cf. 437 B) and εἶναι τοῦτο etc. is a loose exegesis. The only emendation worth notice is Adam's insertion of καὶ τινός between τινός and εἶναι, which yields a smooth, but painfully explicit, construction.

namely, of health and disease, the result^a was that it itself became some kind of science and this caused it to be no longer called simply science but with the addition of the particular kind, medical science." "I understand," he said, "and agree that it is so." "To return to thirst, then," said I, "will you not class it with the things^b that are of something and say that it is what it is^c in relation to something—and it is, I presume, thirst?" "I will," said he, "—namely of drink." "Then if the drink is of a certain kind, so is the thirst, but thirst that is just thirst is neither of much nor little nor good nor bad, nor in a word of any kind, but just thirst is naturally of just drink only." "By all means." "The soul of the thirsty then, in so far as it thirsts, wishes nothing else than to drink, and yearns for this and its impulse is towards this." "Obviously." "Then if anything draws it back^d when thirsty it must be something different in it from that which thirsts and drives it like a beast^e to drink. For it cannot be, we say, that

Plato means that the something which made King David refuse the draught purchased by the blood of his soldiers and Sir Philip Sidney pass the cup to a wounded comrade is somehow different from the animal appetite which it overpowers. ^a ἐπτόχται: almost technical, as in Sappho's ode, for the flutter of desire. ἀλόγιστον, though applied here to the ἐπιθυμητικόν only, suggests the bipartite division of Aristotle, Eth. Nic. 1102 a 28.

^b So the bad steed which symbolizes the ἐπιθυμητικόν in Phaedr. 253 E is ἀλαζονείας ἐταῖρος.

^c We now approach the distinctively Platonic sense of θυμός as the power of noble wrath, which, unless perverted by a bad education, is naturally the ally of the reason, though as mere angry passion it might seem to belong to the irrational part of the soul, and so, as Glaucon suggests, be akin to appetite, with which it is associated in the mortal soul of the Timaeus 69 D.

In Laws 731 B-C Plato tells us again that the soul cannot combat injustice without the capacity for righteous indignation. The Stoics affected to deprecate anger always, and the difference remained a theme of controversy between them and the Platonists. Cf. Schmidt, Ethik der Griechen, ii. pp. 321 ff., Seneca, De ira, i. 9, and passim. Moralists are still divided on the point. Cf. hunger, thirst, and feels the flutter^a and titillation of other desires, the irrational and appetitive—companion^b of various repletions and pleasures.” “It would not be unreasonable but quite natural,” he said, “for us to think this.” “These two forms, then, let us assume to have been marked off as actually existing in the soul. But now the Thumos^c or principle of high spirit, that with which we feel anger, is it a third, or would it be identical in nature with one of these?” “Perhaps,” he said, “with one of these, the appetitive.” “But,” I said, “I once heard a story^d which I believe, that Leontius the son of Aglaion, on his way up from the Peiraeus under the outer side of the northern wall,^e becoming aware of dead bodies^f that lay at the place of public execution at the same time felt a desire to see them and a repugnance and aversion, and that for a time he

The supine placidity of civilization is not favourable to animosity [Bacon’s word for θυμός].” Leslie Stephen, Science of Ethics, pp. 60 ff. and p. 62, seems to contradict Plato: “The supposed conflict between reason and passion is, as I hold, meaningless if it is taken to imply that the reason is a faculty separate from the emotions,” etc. But this is only his metaphysics. On the practical ethical issue he is with Plato.

^a Socrates has heard and trusts a, to us, obscure anecdote which shows how emotion may act as a distinct principle rebuking the lower appetites or curiosities. Leontius is unknown, except for Bergk’s guess identifying him with the Leotrophides of a corrupt fragment of Theopompus Comicus, fr. 1 Kock, p. 739.

^d ἀντιπράττειν: that is, oppose the reason. It may be construed with δεῖν or as the verb of αὐτόν. There are no real difficulties in the passage, though many have been found. The order of words and the anacoluthon are intentional and effective. Cf. supra on 434 c. οὐκ ἂν . . . ποτέ is to literal understanding an exaggeration. But Plato is

"I too," he said, "have heard the story." "Yet, surely, this anecdote," I said, "signifies that the principle of anger sometimes fights against desires as an alien thing against an alien." "Yes, it does," he said.

XV. "And do we not," said I, "on many other occasions observe when his desires constrain a man contrary to his reason that he reviles himself and is angry with that within which masters him; and that as it were in a faction of two parties the high spirit of such a man becomes the ally of his reason? But its^c making common cause^d with the desires against the reason when reason whispers low^e 'Thou must not'—that, I think, is a kind of thing you would not affirm ever to have perceived in yourself, nor, I fancy, in anybody else either." "But what when a man believes himself to be wronged, does not his spirit in that case^b seethe and grow fierce (and also because of his suffering hunger, cold and the like) and make itself the ally of what he judges just, and in noble souls^c it endures and wins the victory and will not let go until either it achieves its purpose, or death ends all, or, as a dog is called back by a shepherd, it is called back by the reason within and calmed." "Your similitude is perfect," he said, "and it confirms^d our former statements that the helpers are as it were dogs subject to the rulers who are as it were the shepherds of the city." "You apprehend my meaning excellently," said I. "But do you also take note of this?" "Of what?" "That what we now think about the spirited element is just the opposite of our recent surmise. For then we supposed it to be a part of the appetitive, but now, far from that, we say that, in the factions^e of the soul, it much rather marshals itself on the side of the reason." "By all means," he said. "Is it then distinct from this too, or is it a form of the rational, so that there are not three but two kinds in the soul, warrant in Plato's use of γενναῖος. Cf. 375 E, 459 A. The only argument against the view here taken is that "θυμός is not the subject of λήγει," which it plainly is. The shift from θυμός to the man in what follows is no difficulty and is required only by τελευτήσῃ, which may well be a gloss. Cf. A.J.P. xvi. p. 237.

α It still remains to distinguish the λογιστικόν from θυμός, which is done first by pointing out that young children and animals possess θυμός (cf. Laws 963 E, *Aristot. the rational and the appetitive, or just as in the city there were three existing kinds that composed its structure, the money-makers, the helpers, the counsellors, so also in the soul there exists a third kind, this principle of high spirit, which is the helper of reason by nature unless it is corrupted by evil nurture?" "We have to assume it as a third," he said. "Yes," said I, "provided^a it shall have been shown to be something different from the rational, as it has been shown to be other than the appetitive." "That is not hard to be shown," he said; "for that much one can see in children, that they are from their very birth chock-full of rage and high spirit, but as for reason, some of them, to my thinking, never participate in it, and the majority quite late." "Yes, by heaven, excellently said," I replied; "and further, one could see in animals that what you say is true. And to these instances we may add the testimony of Homer quoted above:

He smote his breast and chided thus his heart.

For there Homer has clearly represented that in us which has reflected about the better and the worse as rebuking that which feels unreasoning anger as if it were a distinct and different thing." "You are entirely right," he said.

^b ἀπαμβλύνεται: is the edge or outline of the definition blunted or dimmed when we transfer it to the individual?

^c The transcendental or philosophical definition is confirmed by vulgar tests. The man who is just in Plato's sense will not steal or betray or fail in ordinary duties. Cf. Aristot. Eth. Nic. 1178 b 16 ἢ φορτικὸς ὁ ἐπαινος . . . to say that the gods are σώφρονες. Similarly Plato feels that there is a certain vulgarity in applying the cheap tests of prudential morality (cf. Phaedo 68 c-d) to intrinsic virtue. "Be this," is the highest expression of the moral individual." "But surely, now, a man is just by that which and in the way we have so often ^a described." "That is altogether necessary." "Well then," said I, "has our idea of justice in any way lost the edge ^b of its contour so as to look like anything else than precisely what it showed itself to be in the state?" "I think not," he said. "We might," I said, "completely confirm your reply and our own conviction thus, if anything in our minds still disputes our definition—by applying commonplace and vulgar ^c tests to it." "What are these?" "For example, if an answer were demanded to the question concerning that city and the man whose birth and breeding was in harmony with it, whether we believe that such a man, entrusted with a deposit ^d of gold or silver, would withhold it and embezzle it, who do you suppose would think that he would be more likely so to act than men of a different kind?" "No one would," he said. "And would not he be far removed from sacrilege and theft and betrayal of comrades in private life or of the state in public?" "He would." "And, moreover, he would not be in any way faithless either in the keeping of his oaths or in other agreements." "How could he?" "Adultery, surely, and neglect of parents and of the due service of the gods would pertain to anyone rather than to such a man." "To anyone indeed," he said. "And is not the cause law. "Do this," inevitably follows. Cf. Leslie Stephen, Science of Ethics, pp. 376 and 385, and Emerson, Self-Reliance: "But I may also neglect the reflex standard, and absolve me to myself . . . If anyone imagines that this law is lax, let him keep its commandment one day." The Xenophontic Socrates (Xen. Mem. iv. 4. 10-11 and iv. 4. 17) relies on these vulgar tests.

^b The contemplation of the εἶδωλον, image or symbol, leads us to the reality. The reality is always the Platonic Idea. The εἶδωλον, in the case of ordinary "things," is the material copy which men mistake for the reality (516 A). In the case of spiritual things and moral ideas, there is no visible image or symbol (Polit. 286 A), but imperfect analogies, popular definitions, suggestive phrases, as τὰ ἑαυτοῦ πράττειν, well-meant laws and institutions serve as the εἶδωλα in which the philosophic dialectician may find a reflection of the true idea. "Do you still, then, look for justice to be anything else than this potency which provides men and cities of this sort?" "No, by heaven," he said, "I do not."

"Finished, then, is our dream and perfected—the surmise we spoke of,^a that, by some Providence, at the very beginning of our foundation of the state, we chanced to hit upon the original principle and a sort of type of justice." "Most assuredly." "It really was, it seems, Glaucon, which is why it helps,^b a sort of adumbration of justice, this principle that it is right for the cobbler by nature to cobble and occupy himself with nothing else, and the carpenter to practise carpentry, and similarly all others. But the truth of the matter^c was, as it seems, that justice is indeed something of this kind, yet not in regard to the doing of one's own business externally, but with regard to that which is within and in the true sense concerns one's self, and the things of one's self—it means that^d

"Well," said I, "if we should affirm that we had found the just man and state and what justice really is ^c in them, I think we should not be much mistaken." "No indeed, we should not," he said. "Shall we affirm it, then?" "Let us so affirm."

XVIII. "So be it, then," said I; "next after this, I take it, we must consider injustice." "Obviously." "Must not this be a kind of civil war ^d of these three principles, their meddlesomeness ^e and interference with one another's functions, and the revolt of one part against the whole of the soul that it may hold therein a rule which does not belong to it, since its nature is such that it befits it to serve as a slave to the ruling principle? Something of this sort, I fancy, is what we shall say, and that the confusion of these principles and their straying from their proper course is injustice and licentiousness and cowardice and brutish ignorance and, in general, ^f all turpitude." "Precisely this," he replied. "Then," said I, "to act unjustly and be unjust and in turn to act justly—the meaning of all these terms becomes at once plain and clear, since injustice and justice are so." "How so?" "Because," said I, "these are in the soul what ^g the healthful and the diseaseful are in the body;

there is no difference." "In what respect?" he said. "Healthful things surely engender health^a and diseaseful disease." "Yes." "Then does not doing just acts engender justice and unjust injustice?" "Of necessity." "But to produce health is to establish the elements in a body in the natural relation of dominating and being dominated^b by one another, while to cause disease is to bring it about that one rules or is ruled by the other contrary to nature." "Yes, that is so." "And is it not likewise the production of justice in the soul to establish its principles in the natural relation of controlling and being controlled by one another, while injustice is to cause the one to rule or be ruled by the other contrary to nature?" "Exactly so," he said. "Virtue, then, as it seems, would be a kind of health^c and beauty and good condition of the soul, and vice would be disease,^d ugliness, and weakness." "It is so." "Then is it not also true that beautiful and honourable pursuits tend to the winning of virtue and the ugly to vice?" "Of necessity."

"And now at last, it seems, it remains for us to consider whether it is profitable to do justice and practise honourable pursuits and be just, whether^e one is known to be such or not, or whether injustice profits, and to be unjust, if only a man escape punishment and is not bettered by chastisement.^f" "Nay,

"What do you mean?" he said. "As many as are the varieties of political constitutions that constitute specific types, so many, it seems likely, are the characters of soul." "How many, pray?" "There are five kinds of constitutions," said I, "and five kinds of soul." "Tell me what they are," he said. "I tell you," said I, "that one way of government would be the constitution that we have just expounded, but the names that might be applied to it are two.^b If one man of surpassing merit rose among the rulers, it would be denominated royalty; if more than one, aristocracy." "True," he said. "Well, then," I said, "this is one of the forms I have in mind. It is idle then to argue with Immisch, Krohn, and others that the passage marks a sudden, violent alteration of the original design.

for what special reason, pray?" said I. "We think you are a slacker," he said, "and are trying to cheat^a us out of a whole division,^b and that not the least, of the argument to avoid the trouble of expounding it, and expect to 'get away with it' by observing thus lightly that, of course, in respect to women and children it is obvious to everybody that the possessions of friends will be in common.^c" "Well, isn't that right, Adeimantus?" I said. "Yes," said he, "but this word 'right,'^d like other things, requires defining^e as to the way^f and manner of such a community. There might be many ways. Don't, then, pass over the one that you^g have in mind. For we have long been lying in wait for you, expecting that you would say something both of the procreation of children and their bringing up,^h and would explain the whole matter of the community of women and children of which you speak. We think that the right or wrong management of this makes a great difference, all the difference in the world,ⁱ in the constitution of a state; so now, since you are beginning on another constitution before sufficiently defining this, we are firmly resolved, as you overheard, not to let you go till you have expounded all this as fully as you did the rest." "Set me down, too," said Glaucon, "as voting this ticket.^j" "Surely," said Thrasymachus, "you may consider it a joint resolution of us all, Socrates."

"Well," said Thrasymachus,^d "do you suppose this company has come here to prospect for gold^e and not to listen to discussions?" "Yes," I said, "in measure." "Nay, Socrates," said Glaucon, "the measure^f of listening to such discussions is the whole of life for reasonable men. So don't consider us, and do not you yourself grow weary in explaining to us what we ask for, your views as to how this communion of wives and children among our guardians will be managed, and also about the rearing of the children while still young in the interval between^g birth and formal schooling which is thought to be the most difficult part of education. Try, then, to tell us what must be the manner of it." "It is not an easy thing to expound, my dear fellow," said I, "for even more than the provisions that precede it, it raises many doubts. And I said, "My good fellow, is that remark intended to encourage me?" "It is," he said. "Well then," said I, "it has just the contrary effect. For, if I were confident that I was speaking with knowledge, it would be an excellent encouragement. For there is both safety and boldness in speaking the truth with knowledge about our greatest and dearest concerns to those who are both wise and dear. But to speak when one doubts himself and is seeking while he talks, as I am doing, is a fearful and slippery venture. The fear is not of being laughed at,^c for that is childish, but, lest, missing the truth, I fall down and drag my friends with me in matters where it most imports not to stumble. So I salute Nemesis,^d Glaucon, in what I am about to say. For, indeed,^e I believe that involuntary homicide is a lesser fault than to mislead opinion about the honourable, the good, and the just. with friends, so that your encouragement is none." And Glaucon, with a laugh, said, "Nay, Socrates, if any false note in the argument does us any harm, we release you as^a in a homicide case, and warrant you pure of hand and no deceiver of us. So speak on with confidence." "Well," said I, "he who is released in that case is counted pure as the law bids, and, presumably, if there, here too." "Speak on, then," he said, "for all this objection." "We must return then," said I, "and say now what perhaps ought to have been said in due sequence there. But maybe this way is right, that after the completion of the male drama we should in turn go through with the female,^b especially since you are so urgent."

"Let us preserve the analogy, then, and assign them a generation and breeding answering to it, and see if it suits us or not." "In what way?" he said. "In this. Do we expect the females of watch-dogs to join in guarding what the males guard and to hunt with them and share all their pursuits or do we expect the of sinners. "They have all things in common," he replied, "except that we treat the females as weaker and the males as stronger." "Is it possible, then," said I, "to employ any creature for the same ends as another if you do not assign it the same nurture and education?" "It is not possible." "If, then, we are to use the women for the same things as the men, we must also teach them the same things." "Yes." "Now music together with gymnastic was the training we gave the men." "Yes." "Then we must assign these two arts to the women also and the offices of war and employ them in the same way." "It would seem likely from what you say," he replied. "Perhaps, then," said I, "the contrast with present custom^a would make much in our proposals look ridiculous if our words^b are to be realized in fact." "Yes, indeed," he said. "Then," said I, "since we have set out to speak our minds, we must not fear all the jibes^a with which the wits would greet so great a revolution, and the sort of things they would say about gymnastics and culture, and most of all about the bearing of arms and the bestriding of horses." raise the question whether female human nature is capable of sharing with the male all tasks or none at all, or some but not others,^a and under which of these heads this business of war falls. Would not this be that best beginning which would naturally and proverbially lead to the best end ^b ? ” “ Far the best,” he said. “ Shall we then conduct the debate with ourselves in behalf of those others^c so that the case of the other side may not be taken defenceless and go by default ^d ? ” “ Nothing hinders,” he said. “ Shall we say then in their behalf: ‘ There is no need, Socrates and Glaucon, of others disputing against you, for you yourselves at the beginning of the foundation of your city agreed ^e that each one ought to mind as his own business the one thing for which he was fitted by nature ? ’ ” “ We did so agree, I think ; certainly ! ” “ Can it be denied then that there is by nature a great difference between men and women ? ” “ Surely there is.” “ Is it not fitting, then, that a different function should be appointed for each corresponding to this difference of nature ? ” “ Certainly.” “ How, then, can you deny that you are mistaken and in contradiction with yourselves when you turn around and affirm that the men and the women ought to do the same thing, though their natures are so far apart ? ” Can you surprise me with an answer to that question?" "Not easily on this sudden challenge," he replied: "but I will and do beg you to lend your voice to the plea in our behalf, whatever it may be." "These and many similar difficulties, Glaucon," said I, "I foresaw and feared, and so shrank from touching on the law concerning the getting and breeding of women and children." "It does not seem an easy thing, by heaven," he said, "no, by heaven." "No, it is not," said I; "but the fact is that whether one tumbles into a little diving-pool or plump into the great sea he swims all the same." "By all means." "Then we, too, must swim and try to escape out of the sea^a of argument in the hope that either some dolphin^b will take us on its back or some other desperate rescue." "So it seems," he said. "Come then, consider," said I, "if we can find a way out. We did agree that different natures should have differing pursuits and that the nature of men and women differ. And yet now we affirm that these differing natures should have the same pursuits. That is the indictment?" "It is." "What a grand^c thing. Glaucon," said I, "is the power of the art of contradiction^d!" "Why so?" "Because," said I, "many appear to me to fall into it even against their wills, and to suppose that they are not wrangling but arguing, owing to their inability to apply the proper divisions and distinctions to the subject under con- which Isocrates maliciously confounds with dialectic while Plato is careful to distinguish them. sideration. They pursue purely verbal oppositions, practising eristic, not dialectic on one another." "Yes, this does happen to many," he said; "but does this observation apply to us too at present?" "Absolutely," said I; "at any rate I am afraid that we are unawares^a slipping into contentiousness." "In what way?" "The principle that natures not the same ought not to share in the same pursuits we are following up most manfully and eristically^b in the literal and verbal sense; but we did not delay to consider at all what particular kind of diversity and identity^c of nature we had in mind and with reference to what we were trying to define it when we assigned different pursuits to different natures and the same to the same." "No, we didn't consider that," he said. "Wherefore, by the same token," I said, "we might ask ourselves whether the natures of bald^d and long-haired men are the same and not, rather, the contrary. And, after agreeing that they were opposed, we might, if the bald cobbled, forbid the long-haired to do so, or vice versa." "That would be ridiculous," he said. "Would it be so," said I, "for any other reason than that we did not then posit likeness and difference of nature in any and every sense, but were paying heed solely to the kind of diversity and homogeneity that was pertinent^e to the pursuits themselves? We meant, for example, that a man and a woman who have a physician's^a mind have the same nature. Don't you think so?" "I do." "But that a man physician and a man carpenter have different natures?" "Certainly, I suppose."

V. "Similarly, then," said I, "if it appears that the male and the female sex have distinct qualifications for any arts or pursuits, we shall affirm that they ought to be assigned respectively to each. But if it appears that they differ only in just this respect that the female bears and the male begets, we shall say that no proof has yet been produced that the woman differs from the man for our purposes, but we shall continue to think that our guardians and their wives ought to follow the same pursuits." "And rightly," said he. "Then, is it not the next thing to bid our opponent tell us precisely for what art or pursuit concerned with the conduct of a state the woman's nature differs from the man's?" "That would be at any rate fair." "Perhaps, then, someone else, too, might say what you were saying a while ago, that it is not easy to find a satisfactory answer on a sudden,^b but that with time for reflection there is no difficulty." "He might say that." "Shall we, then, beg the raiser of such objections to follow us, if we may perhaps prove able to make it plain to him that there is no pursuit connected with the administration of a state that is peculiar to woman?" "By all means." "Come then, we shall say to him, answer our question. Was this the basis of your distinction between the man naturally gifted for anything and the one not so gifted—that the one learned easily, surprises assent. Cf. more fully 487 B, and for a comic version Hippias Major 295 A "if I could go off for a little by myself in solitude I would tell you the answer more precisely than precision itself."

the other with difficulty; that the one with slight instruction could discover^a much for himself in the matter studied, but the other, after much instruction and drill, could not even remember what he had learned; and that the bodily faculties of the one adequately served^b his mind, while, for the other, the body was a hindrance? Were there any other points than these by which you distinguish the well endowed man in every subject and the poorly endowed?" "No one," said he, "will be able to name any others." "Do you know, then, of anything practised by mankind in which the masculine sex does not surpass the female on all these points?" "Must we make a long story of it by alleging weaving and the watching of pancakes and the boiling pot, whereon the sex plumes itself and wherein its defeat will expose it to most laughter?" "You are right," he said, "that the one sex^d is far surpassed by the other in everything, one may say. Many women, it is true, are better than many men in many things, but broadly speaking, it is as you say." "Then there is no pursuit of the administrators of a state that belongs to a woman because she is a woman or to a man because he is a man. But the natural capacities are distributed alike among both creatures, and women naturally share in all pursuits and men in all—yet for all the woman is weaker than the man." "Assuredly." "Shall we, then, assign them all to men and nothing to women?" "How could we?" "We shall rather, I take it, say that one woman has the remarks on women as cooks of the bachelor Nietzsche, Beyond Good and Evil, § 234. But Xen. Mem. iii. 9. 11 takes the ordinary view. On the character of women generally cf. Laws 781 and Aristotle in Zeller trans. ii. 215.

"In the city, then, that we are founding, which do you think will prove the better men, the guardians receiving the education which we have described or the cobblers educated by the art of cobbling^b?" VII. "In this matter, then, of the regulation of women, we may say that we have surmounted one of the waves of our paradox and have not been quite swept^c away by it in ordaining that our guardians and female guardians must have all pursuits in common, but that in some sort the argument concurs with itself in the assurance that what it proposes is both possible and beneficial." "It is no slight wave that you are thus escaping." "You will not think it a great^d one," I said, "when you have seen the one that follows." "Say on then and show me," said he. "This," said I, "and all that precedes has for its sequel, in my opinion, the following law." "What?" "That these women shall all be common^e to all these men, and appetite, connected with a contempt of human life which is excessive even for paganism."

Most of the obvious parallels between Plato and Aristophanes' Ecclesiazusae follow as a matter of course from the very notion of communal marriage and supply no evidence for the dating of a supposed earlier edition of the whole or a part of the Republic. In any case the ideas of the Republic might have come to Aristophanes in conversation before publication; and the Greeks knew enough of the facts collected in such books as Westermarck's Marriage, not to be taken altogether by surprise by Plato's speculations. that none shall cohabit with any privately ; and that the children shall be common, and that no parent shall know its own offspring nor any child its parent." " This is a far bigger paradox than the other, and provokes more distrust as to its possibility and its utility.^a " " I presume," said I, " that there would be no debate about its utility, no denial that the community of women and children would be the greatest good, supposing it possible. But I take it that its possibility or the contrary would be the chief topic of contention." " Both," he said, " would be right sharply debated." " You mean," said I, " that I have to meet a coalition of arguments. But I expected to escape from one of them, and that if you agreed that the thing was beneficial, it would remain for me to speak only of its feasibility." " You have not escaped detection," he said, " in your attempted flight, but you must render an account of both." " I must pay the penalty," I said, " yet do me this much grace : Permit me to take a holiday, just as men of lazy minds are wont to feast themselves on their own thoughts when they walk alone.^b Such persons, without waiting to discover how their desires may be realized, dismiss that topic to save themselves the labour of deliberating about possibilities and impossibilities, assume their wish fulfilled, and proceed to work out the details in imagination, and take pleasure in portraying what they will do when it is realized, thus making still more idle a mind that is idle without that.^c I too now succumb to this weak-

This is what I would try to consider first together with you, and thereafter the other topic, if you allow it." "I do allow it," he said: "proceed with the inquiry." "I think, then," said I, "that the rulers, if they are to deserve that name, and their helpers likewise, will, the one, be willing to accept orders,^c and the other, to give them, in some things obeying our laws, and imitating^d them in others which we leave to their discretion." "Presumably." "You, then, the lawgiver," I said, "have picked these men and similarly will select to give over to them women as nearly as possible of the same nature.^e And they, having houses and meals in common, and no private possessions of that kind, will dwell together, and being commingled in gymnastics and in all their life and education, will be conducted by innate necessity to sexual union. VIII. "They are, indeed," I said; "but next, Glaucon, disorder and promiscuity in these unions or in anything else they do would be an unhallowed thing in a happy state and the rulers will not suffer it." "It would not be right," he said. "Obviously, then, we must arrange marriages, sacramental so far as may be. And the most sacred marriages would be those that were most beneficial." "By all means." "How, then, would the greatest benefit result? Tell me this, Glaucon. I see that you have in your house hunting-dogs and a number of pedigree cocks.^b Have you ever considered something about their unions and procreations?" "What?"^c he said. "In the first place," I said, "among these themselves, although they are a select breed, do not some prove better than the rest?" "They do." "Do you then breed from all indiscriminately, or are you careful to breed from the best^d?" "From the best." "And, again, do you breed from the youngest or the oldest, or, so far as may be, from those in their prime?" "From those in their prime." "And if they are not thus bred, you expect, do you not, that your birds' breed and hounds will greatly degenerate?" "I do," he said. "And what of horses and other animals?" I said; "is it otherwise with them?" "It would be strange if it were," said he. "Gracious," said I, "dear friend, how imperative, then, is our need of the frequent in the later style of the Sophist, Politicus and Philebus."

highest skill in our rulers, if the principle holds also for mankind." "Well, it does," he said, "but what of it?" "This," said I, "that they will have to employ many of those drugs^a of which we were speaking. We thought that an inferior physician sufficed for bodies that do not need drugs but yield to diet and regimen. But when it is necessary to prescribe drugs we know that a more enterprising and venturesome physician is required." "True; but what is the pertinency?" "This," said I: "it seems likely that our rulers will have to make considerable use of falsehood and deception for the benefit^b of their subjects. We said, I believe, that the use of that sort of thing was in the category of medicine." "And that was right," he said. "In our marriages, then, and the procreation of children, it seems there will be no slight need of this kind of 'right.'" "How so?" "It follows from our former admissions," I said, "that the best men must cohabit with the best women in as many cases as possible and the worst with the worst in the fewest, and that the offspring of the one must be reared and that of the other not, if the flock^c is to be as perfect as possible. And the way in which all this is brought to pass must be unknown to any but the rulers, if, again, the herd of guardians is to be as free as possible from dissension." "Most true," he said. "We shall, then, have to ordain certain festivals and sacrifices, in which we shall bring together the brides and the bridegrooms, and our poets must compose hymns suitable to the marriages that then take place. But the number of the marriages we will leave to the dis-

"Right," he said. "Certain ingenious lots, then, I suppose, must be devised so that the inferior man at each conjugation may blame chance and not the rulers." "Yes, indeed," he said.

IX. "And on the young men, surely, who excel in war and other pursuits we must bestow honours and prizes, and, in particular, the opportunity of more frequent intercourse with the women, which will at the same time be a plausible pretext for having them beget as many of the children as possible." "Right." "And the children thus born will be taken over by the officials appointed for this, men or women or both, since, I take it, the official posts too are common to women and men. The offspring of the good, I suppose, they will take to the pen or crèche, to certain nurses who live apart in a quarter of the city, but the offspring of the inferior, and any of those of the other sort who are born defective, they will properly dispose of in secret,^b so that no one will know what has become of them." "True." "Do you agree that the period of the prime may be fairly estimated at twenty years for a woman and thirty for a man?" "How do you reckon it?"^b he said. "The women," I said, "beginning at the age of twenty, shall bear for the state^c to the age of forty, and the man shall beget for the state from the time he passes his prime in swiftness in running to the age of fifty-five." "That is," he said, "the maturity and prime for both of body and mind." "Then, if anyone older or younger than the prescribed age meddles with procreation for the state, we shall say that his error is an impiety and an injustice, since he is begetting for the city a child whose birth, if it escapes discovery, will not be attended by the sacrifices and the prayers which the priests and priestesses and the entire city prefer at the ceremonial marriages, that ever better offspring may spring from good sires^d and from fathers helpful to the state sons more helpful still. But this child will be born in darkness and conceived in foul incontinence."

We shall say that he is imposing on the state a base-born, uncertified, and unhallowed child." "Most rightly," he said. "But when, I take it, the men and the women have passed the age of lawful procreation, we shall leave the men free to form such relations with whomsoever they please, except ^a daughter and mother and their direct descendants and ascendants, and likewise the women, save with son and father, and so on, first admonishing them preferably not even to bring to light ^b anything whatever thus conceived, but if they are unable to prevent a birth to dispose of it on the understanding that we cannot rear such an offspring." "All that sounds reasonable," he said; "but how are they to distinguish one another's fathers and daughters, and the other degrees of kin that you have just mentioned?" "They won't," said I, "except that a man will call all male offspring born in the tenth and in the seventh month after he became a bridegroom his sons, and all female, daughters, and they will call him father.^c And, similarly, he will call their offspring his grandchildren^d and they will call his group grandfathers and grandmothers. And all children born in the period in which their fathers and mothers were procreating will regard one another as brothers and sisters. X. "This, then, Glaucon, is the manner of the community of wives and children among the guardians. That it is consistent with the rest of our polity and by far the best way is the next point that we must get confirmed by the argument. Is not that so?" "It is, indeed," he said. "Is not the logical first step towards such an agreement to ask ourselves what we could name as the greatest good for the constitution of a state and the proper aim of a lawgiver in his legislation, and what would be the greatest evil, and then to consider whether the proposals we have just set forth fit into the footprints^a of the good and do not suit those of the evil?" "By all means," he said. "Do we know of any greater evil for a state than the thing that distracts it and makes it many instead of one, or a greater good than that which binds it together and makes it one?" "We do not." "Is not, then, the community of pleasure and pain the tie that binds, when, so far as may be, all the citizens rejoice and grieve alike at the same births and deaths?" "By all means," he said. "But the individualization of these feelings is a dissolvent, when some grieve exceedingly and others rejoice at the same happenings to the city and its inhabitants?" "Of course." "And the chief cause of this is when the citizens do not utter in unison such words as 'mine' and 'not mine,' and similarly with regard to the word 'alien'?"^a "Precisely so." "That city, then, is best ordered in which the greatest number use the expression 'mine' and 'not mine' of the same things in the same way." "Much the best." "And the city whose state is most like that of an individual man.^b For example, if the finger of one of us is wounded, the entire community of bodily connexions stretching to the soul for 'integration'^c with the dominant part is made aware, and all of it feels the pain as a whole, though it is a part that suffers, and that is how we come to say that the man has a pain in his finger. And for any other member of the man the same statement holds, alike for a part that labours in pain or is eased by pleasure." "The same," he said, "and, to return to your question, the best governed state most nearly resembles such an organism." "That is the kind of a state, then, I presume, that, when anyone of the citizens suffers aught of good or evil, will be most likely to speak of the part that suffers as its own and will share the pleasure or the pain as a whole." "Inevitably," he said, "if it is well governed."

the qualities agreed upon in our argument.^a "We must," he said. "Well, then, there are to be found in other cities rulers and the people as in it, are there not?" "There are." "Will not all these address one another as fellow-citizens?" "Of course." "But in addition to citizens, what does the people in other states call its rulers?" "In most cities, masters, in democratic cities, just this—rulers." "But what of the people in our city. In addition to citizens, what do they call their rulers?" "Saviours and helpers," he said. "And what term do these apply to the people?" "Payers of their wage and supporters." "And how do the rulers in other states denominate the populace?" "Slaves," he said. "And how do the rulers describe one another?" "Co-rulers," he said. "And ours?" "Co-guardians." "Can you tell me whether any of the rulers in other states would speak of some of their co-rulers as 'belonging' and others as outsiders?" "Yes, many would." "And such a one thinks and speaks of the one that 'belongs' as his own, doesn't he, and of the outsider as not his own?" "That is so." "But what of your guardians. Could any of them think or speak of his co-guardian as an outsider?" "By no means," he said; "for no matter whom he meets, he will feel that he is meeting a brother, a sister, a father, a mother, a son, a daughter, or the offspring or forebears of these." "Excellent," said I; "but tell me this further, will it be merely the names^b of this kinship that you have prescribed for them or must all their actions conform to the were right in so agreeing." "Then it is the greatest blessing for a state of which the community of women and children among the helpers has been shown to be the cause." "Quite so," he said. "And this is consistent with what we said before. For we said,^a I believe, that these helpers must not possess houses of their own or land or any other property, but that they should receive from the other citizens for their support the wage of their guardianship and all spend it in common. That was the condition of their being true guardians." "Right," he said. "Is it not true, then, as I am trying to say, that those former and these present prescriptions tend to make them still more truly guardians and prevent them from distracting the city by referring 'mine' not to the same but to different things, one man dragging off to his own house anything he is able to acquire apart from the rest, and another doing the same to his own separate house, and having women and children apart, thus introducing into the state the pleasures and pains of individuals? They should all rather, we said, share one conviction about their own, tend to one goal, and so far as practicable have one experience of pleasure and pain." "By all means," he said. "Then will not law-suits and accusations against one another vanish,^b one may say,^c from among them, because they have nothing in private possession but their bodies, but all else in common? So that we can count on their being free from the dissensions that arise among men from the possession of property, children, and kin." "They will necessarily be quit objects that it is not lack of unity but wickedness that causes these evils.

"These," he said; "for it would be absurd for them merely to pronounce with their lips the names of kinship without the deeds." "Then, in this city more than in any other, when one citizen fares well or ill, men will pronounce in unison the word of which we spoke: 'It is mine that does well; it is mine that does ill.' " "That is most true," he said. "And did we not say that this conviction and way of speech ^d brings with it a community in pleasures and pains? " "And rightly, too." "Then these citizens, above all others, will have one and the same thing in common which they will name mine, and by virtue of this communion they will have their pleasures and pains in common." "Quite so." "And is not the cause of this, besides the general constitution of the state, the community of wives and children among the guardians? " "It will certainly be the chief cause," he said.

of these," he said. "And again, there could not rightly arise among them any law-suit for assault or bodily injury. For as between age-fellows^a we shall say that self-defence is honourable and just, thereby compelling them to keep their bodies in condition." "Right," he said. "And there will be the further advantage in such a law that an angry man, satisfying his anger in such wise, would be less likely to carry the quarrel to further extremes." "Assuredly." "As for an older man, he will always have the charge of ruling and chastising the younger." "Obviously." "Again, it is plain that the young man, except by command of the rulers, will probably not do violence to an elder or strike him, or, I take it, dishonour him in any other way. There being the two competent guardians to prevent that, fear and awe, awe restraining him from laying hands on one who may be his parent, and fear in that the others will rush to the aid of the sufferer, some as sons, some as brothers, some as fathers." "That is the way it works out," he said. "Then in all cases the laws will leave these men to dwell in peace together." "Great peace." "And if these are free from dissensions among themselves, there is no fear that^b the rest of the city will ever start faction against them or with one another." "No, there is not." "The things for which those are felicitated are a small part of what is secured for these. Their victory is fairer and their public support more complete. For the prize of victory that they win is the salvation of the entire state, the fillet that binds their brows is the public support of themselves and their children—they receive honour from the city while they live and when they die a worthy burial." "A fair guerdon, indeed," he said. "Do you recall," said I, "that in the preceding^d argument the objection of somebody or other rebuked us for not making our guardians happy, since, though it was in their power to have everything of the citizens, they had nothing, and we, I believe, replied that this was a consideration to which we would return if occasion offered, but that at present we were making our guardians guardians and the city as a whole as happy as possible, and that we were not modelling^e

our ideal of happiness with reference to any one class?" "I do remember," he said. "Well then, since now the life of our helpers^a has been shown to be far fairer and better than that of the victors at Olympia, need we compare^b it with the life of cobblers and other craftsmen and farmers?" "I think not," he said. "But further, we may fairly repeat what I was saying then also, that if the guardian shall strive for a kind of happiness that will unmake^c him as a guardian and shall not be content with the way of life that is so moderate and secure and, as we affirm, the best, but if some senseless and childish opinion about happiness shall beset him and impel him to use his power to appropriate everything in the city for himself, then he will find out that Hesiod^d was indeed wise, who said that the half was in some sort more than the whole." "If he accepts my counsel," he said, "he will abide in this way of life." "You accept, then, as we have described it, this partnership of the women with our men in the matter of education and children and the guardianship of the other citizens, and you admit that both within the city and when they go forth to war they ought to keep guard together and hunt together as it were like hounds, and have all things in every way, so far as possible, in common, and that so doing they will do what is for the best and nothing that is contrary to female human nature^e in comparison with male or to their natural fellowship^f with one another." for such a community to be brought about among men as it is in the other animals,^a and in what way it is possible?" "You have anticipated," he said, "the point I was about to raise." "For^b as for their wars," I said, "the manner in which they will conduct them is too obvious for discussion." "How so," said he. "It is obvious that they will march out together,^c and, what is more, will conduct their children to war when they are sturdy, in order that, like the children of other craftsmen,^d they may observe the processes of which they must be masters in their maturity; and in addition to looking on they must assist and minister in all the business of war and serve their fathers and mothers. Or have you never noticed the practice in the arts, how for example the sons of potters look on as helpers a long time before they put their hands to the clay?" "They do," indeed. "Should these then be more concerned than our guardians to train the children by observation and experience of what is to be their proper business?" "That would be ridiculous," he said. "But, further, when it comes to fighting, every creature will do better in the presence of its offspring?" "That is so, but the risk, Socrates, is not slight, in the event of disasters such as may happen in war, that, losing their children as well as themselves, they make it impossible for the remnant of the state to recover." first place, is it your idea that the one thing for which we must provide is the avoidance of all danger?" "By no means." "And, if they must incur danger, should it not be for something in which success will make them better?" "Clearly." "Do you think it makes a slight difference and not worth some risk whether men who are to be warriors do or do not observe war as boys?" "No, it makes a great difference for the purpose of which you speak." "Starting, then, from this assumption that we are to make the boys spectators of war, we must further contrive^a security for them and all will be well, will it not?" "Yes." "To begin with, then," said I, "will not the fathers be, humanly speaking, not ignorant of war and shrewd judges of which campaigns are hazardous and which not?" "Presumably," he said. "They will take the boys with them to the one and avoid the others?" "Rightly." "And for officers, I presume," said I, "they will put in charge of them not those who are good for nothing else but men who by age and experience are qualified to serve at once as leaders and as caretakers of children." "Yes, that would be the proper way." "Still, we may object, it is the unexpected^b that happens to many in many cases." "Yes, indeed." "To provide against such chances, then, we must wing^c the children from the start so that if need arises they may fly away and escape." "What do you mean?" he said. "We must mount them when very young," said I, "and first have them taught to ride, and then conduct them to the scene of war, not on mettlesome war-steeds, but on the swiftest and gentlest horses possible; for thus they will have the best view of their own future business and also, if

XV. "But, furthermore, we may cite Homer^a too for the justice of honouring in such ways the valiant among our youth. For Homer says that Ajax, who had distinguished himself in the war, was honoured with the long chine, assuming that the most fitting meed for a brave man in the prime of his youth is that from which both honour and strength will accrue to him." "Most rightly," he said. "We will then," said I, "take Homer as our guide in this at least. We, too, at sacrifices and on other like occasions, will reward the good so far as they have proved themselves good with hymns and the other privileges of which we have just spoken, and also with seats of honour and meat and full cups, so as to combine physical training with honour for the good, both men and women." "Nothing could be better," he said. response.^a "How can we do otherwise?" "And ever after^b we will bestow on their graves the tendance and worship paid to spirits divine. And we will practise the same observance when any who have been adjudged exceptionally good in the ordinary course of life die of old age or otherwise?" "That will surely be right," he said. "But again, how will our soldiers conduct themselves toward enemies?" "In what respect?" "First, in the matter of making slaves of the defeated, do you think it right for Greeks to reduce Greek cities^c to slavery, or rather that, so far as they are able, they should not suffer any other city to do so, but should accustom Greeks to spare Greeks, foreseeing the danger^d of enslavement by the barbarians?" "Sparing them is wholly and altogether the better," said he. "They are not, then, themselves to own Greek slaves, either, and they should advise the other Greeks not to?" "By all means," he said; "at any rate in that way they would be more likely to turn against the barbarians and keep their hands from one another." "And how about stripping the dead after victory of anything except their weapons: is that well? Does it not furnish a pretext to cowards not to advance on the living foe, as if they were doing something needful when poking^e about the dead? Has not this snatching at the spoils ere now destroyed many an army?" "Yes, indeed." "And don't you think it illiberal and greedy to plunder a corpse, and is it not the mark of a womanish and petty^f spirit to deem the body of the dead an enemy when the real foeman has flown away^a and left behind only the instrument^b with which he fought? Do you see any difference between such conduct and that of the dogs^c who snarl at the stones that hit them but don't touch the thrower?" "Not the slightest." "We must abandon, then, the plundering of corpses and the refusal to permit their burial."^d "By heaven, we certainly must," he said.

XVI. "And again, we will not take weapons to the temples for dedicatory^e offerings, especially the weapons of Greeks, if we are at all concerned to preserve friendly relations with the other Greeks. Rather we shall fear that there is pollution in bringing such offerings to the temples from our kind unless in a case where the god bids otherwise."^f "Most rightly," he said. "And in the matter of devastating the land of Greeks and burning their houses, how will your soldiers deal with their enemies." "I would gladly hear your opinion of that." "In my view," said I, "they ought to do neither, but confine themselves to taking away the annual harvest. Shall I tell you why?" "Do." ^a I have so translated technically in order to imply that the Plato of the Republic is already acquainted with the terminology of the Sophist. Cf. Unity of Plato's Thought, notes 375 and 377, followed by Wilamowitz, Platon, i. p. 504. But most editors take διαφορά here as dissension, and construe "applied to the disagreements of two things," which may be right. by two differentiae.^a The two things I mean are the friendly and kindred on the one hand and the alien and foreign on the other. Now the term employed for the hostility of the friendly is faction, and for that of the alien is war." "What you say is in nothing beside the mark," he replied. "Consider, then, if this goes to the mark. I affirm that the Hellenic race is friendly to itself and akin, and foreign and alien to the barbarian." "Rightly," he said. "We shall then say that Greeks fight and wage war with barbarians, and barbarians with Greeks, and are enemies by nature,^b and that war is the fit name for this enmity and hatred. Greeks, however, we shall say, are still by nature the friends of Greeks when they act in this way, but that Greece is sick in that case and divided by faction, and faction is the name we must give to that enmity." "I will allow you that habit of speech," he said. "Then observe," said I, "that when anything of this sort occurs in faction, as the word is now used, and a state is divided against itself, if either party devastates the land and burns the houses of the other such factional strife is thought to be an accursed thing and neither party to be true patriots. Otherwise, they would never have endured thus to outrage their nurse and mother.^c But the moderate and reasonable thing is thought to be that the victors shall take away the crops of the van-

It is uncritical then with Newman (op. cit. p. 430) and many others to take as a recantation of this passage the purely logical observation in Polit. 262 D that Greek and barbarian is an unscientific dichotomy of mankind. ^c The same language was frequently used in the recent World War, but the practice was sometimes less civilized than that which Plato recommends. Hobhouse (Mind in Evolution, p. 384), writing earlier, said, "Plato's conclusions quished, but that their temper shall be that of men who expect to be reconciled and not always to wage war." "That way of feeling," he said, "is far less savage than the other." "Well, then," said I, "is not the city that you are founding to be a Greek city?" "It must be," he said. "Will they then not be good and gentle?" "Indeed they will." "And won't they be philhellenes,^a lovers of Greeks, and will they not regard all Greece as their own and not renounce their part in the holy places common to all Greeks?" "Most certainly." "Will they not then regard any difference with Greeks who are their own people as a form of faction and refuse even to speak of it as war?" "Most certainly." "And they will conduct their quarrels always looking forward to a reconciliation?" "By all means." "They will correct them, then, for their own good, not chastising them with a view to their enslavement^b or their destruction, but acting as correctors, not as enemies." "They will," he said. "They will not, being Greeks, ravage Greek territory nor burn habitations, and they will not admit that in any city all the population are their enemies, men, women and children, but will say that only a few at any time are their foes,^c those, namely, who are to blame for the quarrel. And on all these considerations they will not be willing to lay waste the soil, since the majority are their friends, nor to destroy^d the houses, but will carry the conflict only to the point of compelling the guilty to do justice by the pressure of the

"But^a I fear, Socrates, that, if you are allowed to go on in this fashion, you will never get to speak of the matter you put aside in order to say all this, namely, the possibility of such a polity coming into existence, and the way in which it could be brought to pass. I too am ready to admit that if it could be realized everything would be lovely^b for the state that had it, and I will add what you passed by, that they would also be most successful in war because they would be least likely to desert one another, knowing and addressing each other by the names of brothers, fathers, sons. And if the females should also join in their campaigns, whether in the ranks or marshalled behind to intimidate the enemy,^c or as reserves in case of need, I recognize that all this too would make them irresistible. And at home, also, I observe all the benefits that you omit to mention. But, taking it for granted that I concede these and countless other advantages, consequent on the realization of this polity, don't labour that point further; but let us at once proceed to try to convince ourselves of just this, that it is possible and how it is possible, dismissing everything else." "The more such excuses you offer," he said, "the less you will be released by us from telling in what way the realization of this polity is possible. Speak on, then, and do not put us off." "The first thing to recall, then," I said, "is that it was the inquiry into the nature of justice and injustice that brought us to this pass.^d" "Yes; but what of it?" he said. "Oh, nothing,^e" I replied, "only this: if we do discover what justice is, are we to demand that the just man shall differ from it in no respect, but shall conform in every way to the ideal? Or will it suffice us if he approximate to it as nearly as possible and partake of it more than others?"

"That will content us," he said. "A pattern, then," said I, "was what we wanted when we were inquiring into the nature of ideal justice and asking what would be the character of the perfectly just man, supposing him to exist, and, likewise, in regard to injustice and the completely unjust man. We wished to fix our eyes upon them as types and models, so that whatever we discerned in them of happiness or the reverse would necessarily apply to ourselves in the sense that whosoever is likest them will have the allotment most like to theirs. Our purpose was not to demonstrate the possibility of the realization of these ideals." "In that," he said, "you speak truly." "Do you think, then, that he would be any the less a good painter,^a who, after portraying a pattern of the ideally beautiful man and omitting no touch required for the perfection of the picture, should not be able to prove that it is actually possible for such a man to exist?" "Not I, by Zeus," he said. "Then were not we, as we say, trying to create in words the pattern of a good state?" "Certainly." "Do you think, then, that our words are any the less well spoken if we find ourselves unable to prove that it is possible for a state to be governed in accordance with our words?" "Of course not," he said. "That, then," said I, "is the truth^b of the matter. But if, to please you, we must do our best to show how most probably and in what respect these things would be most nearly realized, again, with a view to such a demonstration, grant me the same point.^c" "What?" "Is it possible for the artist copies the idea, which is denied in Book X. 597 E ff. Apelt, Platonische Aufsätze, p. 67.

anything to be realized in deed as it is spoken in word, or is it the nature of things that action should partake of exact truth less than speech, even if some deny it^a? Do you admit it or not?" "I do," he said. "Then don't insist," said I, "that I must exhibit as realized in action precisely what we expounded in words. But if we can discover how a state might be constituted most nearly answering to our description, you must say that we have discovered that possibility of realization which you demanded. Will you not be content if you get this? I for my part would." "And I too," he said.

XVIII. "Next, it seems, we must try to discover and point out what it is that is now badly managed in our cities, and that prevents them from being so governed, and what is the smallest change that would bring a state to this manner of government, preferably a change in one thing, if not, then in two, and, failing that, the fewest possible in number and the slightest in potency." "By all means," he said. "There is one change, then," said I, "which I think that we can show would bring about the desired transformation. It is not a slight or an easy thing but it is possible." "What is that?" said he. "I am on the very verge," said I, "of what we likened to the greatest wave of paradox. But say it^b I will, even if, to keep the figure, it is likely to wash^c us away on billows of laughter and scorn.^d Listen." "I am all

* This is perhaps the most famous sentence in Plato. Cf. for the idea 499 B, 540 D, Laws 711 D, 712 A, 713 E ff. It is paraphrased by the author of the seventh Epistle (324 B, 326 A-B, 328 A-B) who perhaps quotes Plato too frequently to be Plato himself. Epistle ii. 310 E, though sometimes quoted in this connexion, is not quite the same thought. It is implied in Phaedrus 252 E φιλόσοφος καὶ ἡγεμονικός, and Polit. 293 C, and only seems to be contradicted in Euthydem. 306 B. Aristotle is said to have contradicted it in a lost work (fr. 79, 1489 b 8 ff.). It is paraphrased or parodied by a score of writers from Polybius xii. 28 to Bacon, Hobbes, More, Erasmus, and Bernard Shaw. Boethius transmitted it to the Middle Ages (Cons. Phil. i. 4. 11). It was always on the lips of Marcus Aurelius. Cf. Capitol. Aurel. i. 1 and iv. 27. It was a standardized topic of compliment to princes in Themistius, Julian, the Panegyrici Latini, and many modern imitators. Among the rulers who have been attention," he said. "Unless," said I, "either philosophers become kings^a in our states or those whom we now call our kings and rulers take to the pursuit of philosophy seriously and adequately, and there is a conjunction of these two things, political power and philosophic intelligence, while the motley horde of the natures who at present pursue either apart from the other are compulsorily excluded, there can be no cessation of troubles, dear Glaucon, for our states, nor, I fancy, for the human race either. Nor, until this happens, will this constitution which we have been expounding in theory ever be put into practice within the limits of possibility and see the light of the sun. But this is the thing that has made me so long shrink from speaking out, because I saw that it would be a very paradoxical saying. For it is not easy^b to see that there is no other way of happiness either for private or public life." Whereupon he, "Socrates," said he, "after hurling at us such an utterance and statement as that, you must expect to be attacked by a great multitude of our men of light and leading,^c who forthwith will, so to speak, cast off

And if you don't find words to defend yourself against them, and escape their assault, then to be scorned and flouted will in very truth^c be the penalty you will have to pay."

"And isn't it you," said I, "that have brought this upon me and are to blame?" "And a good thing, too," said he; "but I won't let you down, and will defend you with what I can. I can do so with my good will and my encouragement, and perhaps I might answer your questions more suitably^d than another. So, with such an aid to back you, try to make it plain to the doubters that the truth is as you say." "I must try," I replied, "since you proffer so strong an alliance. I think it requisite, then, if we are to escape the assailants you speak of, that we should define for them whom we mean by the philosophers, who we dare to say ought to be our rulers. When these are clearly discriminated it will be possible to defend ourselves by showing that to them by their very nature belong the study of philosophy and political leadership, while it befits the other sort to let philosophy alone and to follow their leader."

"It is high time," he said, "to produce your definition." "Come, then, follow me on this line, if we may in some fashion or other explain our meaning."

"Proceed," he said. "Must I remind you, then," said I, "or do you remember, that when we affirm that a man is a lover of something, it must be apparent that he is fond of all of it? It will not do to say that some of it he likes and some^e does not."

Is not that your 'reaction' to the fair? One, because his nose is tip-tilted,^a you will praise as piquant, the beak of another you pronounce right-royal, the intermediate type you say strikes the harmonious mean, the swarthy are of manly aspect, the white are children of the gods divinely fair, and as for honey-hued, do you suppose the very word is anything but the euphemistic invention of some lover who can feel no distaste for sallowness when it accompanies the blooming time of youth? And, in short, there is no pretext you do not allege and there is nothing you shrink from saying to justify you in not rejecting any who are in the bloom of their prime." "If it is your pleasure," he said, "to take me as your example of this trait in lovers, I admit it for the sake of the argument." "Again," said I, "do you not observe the same thing in the lovers of wine?^b They welcome every wine on any pretext." "They do, indeed." aspects." "Right," he said. "This, then," said I, "is my division. I set apart and distinguish those of whom you were just speaking, the lovers of spectacles and the arts, and men of action, and separate from them again those with whom our argument is concerned and who alone deserve the appellation of philosophers or lovers of wisdom." "What do you mean?" he said. "The lovers of sounds and sights," I said, "delight in beautiful tones and colours and shapes and in everything that art fashions out of these, but their thought is incapable of apprehending and taking delight in the nature of the beautiful in itself." "Why, yes," he said, "that is so." "And on the other hand, will not those be few^a who would be able to approach beauty itself and contemplate it in and by itself?" "They would, indeed." "He, then, who believes in beautiful things, but neither believes in beauty itself nor is able to follow when someone tries to guide him to the knowledge of it—do you think that his life is a dream or a waking^b? Just consider. Is not the dream state, whether the man is asleep or awake, just this: the mistaking of resemblance for identity?" "I should certainly call that dreaming," he said. "Well, then, take the opposite case: the man whose thought recognizes a beauty in itself, and is able to distinguish that self-beautiful and the things that participate in it, and neither supposes the participants to be it nor it the participants—is his life, in your opinion, a waking or a dream state?" "He is very much awake," he replied. "Could we not rightly, then, call the mental state of the one as knowing, know-

^a ἡρέμα: cf. Symp. 221 b. Plato's humorous use of this word is the source of Emerson's humorous use of "gently."

^b For the humour of the sudden shift to the second person cf. Juvenal, Sat. i. "profer, Galla, caput."

^c To understand what follows it is necessary (1) to assume that Plato is not talking nonsense; (2) to make allowance for the necessity that he is under of combating contemporary fallacies and sophisms which may seem trivial to us (cf. Unity of Plato's Thought, pp. 50 ff.); (3) to remember the greater richness of the Greek language in forms of the verb "to be"; and the misunderstandings introduced by the indiscriminate use of the abstract verbal noun "being" in English—a difficulty which I have tried to meet by varying the terms of the translation; (4) to recognize that apart from ledge, and that of the other as opining, opinion?" "Assuredly." "Suppose, now, he who we say opines but does not know should be angry and challenge our statement as not true—can we find any way of soothing him and gently^a winning him over, without telling him too plainly that he is not in his right mind?" "We must try," he said. "Come, then, consider what we are to say to him, or would you have us question him in this fashion—premisng that if he knows anything, nobody grudges it him, but we should be very glad to see him knowing something—but tell^b us this: Does he who knows know something or nothing? Do you reply in his behalf." "I will reply," he said, "that he knows something." "Is it something that is or is not^c?" "That is. How could that which is not be known?" "We are sufficiently assured of this, then, even if we should examine it from every point of view, that that which entirely^d 'is' is entirely knowable, and that which in no way 'is' is in every way unknowable?" "Most sufficiently." "Good. If a thing, then, is so conditioned as both to be and not to be, would it not lie between that which absolutely and unqualifiedly is metaphysics Plato's main purpose is to insist on the ability to think abstractly as a prerequisite of the higher education; (5) to observe the qualifications and turns of phrase which indicate that Plato himself was not confused by the double meaning of "is not," but was already aware of the distinctions explicitly explained in the Sophist (Cf. Unity of Plato's Thought, pp. 53 ff. nn. 389 ff.)

^a παντελῶς: cf. μηδαμῇ and 478 D πάντως. Not foreseeing modern philology Plato did not think it necessary to repeat these qualifying adverbs in 478 B ἢ ἀδύνατον καὶ δοξάζειν τὸ μὴ εἶναι, which is still sometimes quoted to prove that Plato was "yet" naïvely unaware of the distinction between is-not-at-all (does not exist) and is-not-this-or-that.

* Apart from the metaphysical question of the relativity of all knowledge, the word ἐπιστήμη in Greek usage connotes certainty, and so Plato and Aristotle always take it. But more specifically that which (always) is, for Plato, is the "idea" which is not subject to change and therefore always is what it is, while a particular material thing subject to change and relativity both is and is not any and every predicate that can be applied to it. And since knowledge in the highest sense is for Plato knowledge of abstract and general ideas, both in his and in our sense of the word idea, and that which in no way is?" "Between." "Then since knowledge pertains to that which is and ignorance of necessity to that which is not, for that which lies between we must seek for something between nescience and science, if such a thing there be." "By all means." "Is there a thing which we call opinion?" "Surely." "Is it a different faculty from science or the same?" "A different." "Then opinion is set over one thing and science over another, each by virtue of its own distinctive power or faculty." "That is so." "May we say, then, that science is naturally related to that which is,^a to know that and how that which is is? But rather, before we proceed, I think we must draw the following distinctions." "What ones?"

XXI. "Shall we say that faculties,^b powers, abilities are a class of entities by virtue of which we and all other things are able to do what we or they are able to do? I mean that sight and hearing, for example, are faculties, if so be that you understand the class or type that I am trying to describe." "I understand," he said. "Hear, then, my notion about them. In a faculty I cannot see any colour or shape or similar mark such as those on which in many other cases I fix my eyes in discriminating in my thought one thing from knowledge is said to be of that which is. It is uncritical to ignore Plato's terminology and purpose and to talk condescendingly of his confusing subjective with objective certainty in what follows.

^b The history of the word δύναμις has been studied in recent monographs and its various meanings, from potentiality to active power, discriminated. Cf. J. Souilhé, Étude sur le terme δύναμις dans les Dialogues de Platon, Paris, 1919, pp. 96, 163 ff. But Plato makes his simple meaning here quite plain, and it would be irrelevant to bring in modern denunciations of the "old faculty psychology."

another. But in the case of a faculty I look to one thing only—that to which it is related and what it effects,^a and it is in this way that I come to call^b each one of them a faculty, and that which is related to^c the same thing and accomplishes the same thing I call the same faculty, and that to another I call other. How about you, what is your practice?" "The same," he said. "To return, then, my friend," said I, "to science or true knowledge, do you say that it is a faculty and a power, or in what class do you put it?" "Into this," he said, "the most potent of all^d faculties." "And opinion—shall we assign it to some other class than faculty." "By no means," he said, "for that by which we are able to opine is nothing else than the faculty of opinion."^e "But not long ago you agreed that science and opinion are not identical." "How could any rational man affirm the identity of the infallible with the fallible?" "Excellent," said I, "and we are plainly agreed that opinion is a different^f thing from scientific knowledge." "Yes, different." "Each of them, then, since it has a different power, is related to a different object." "Of necessity." "Science, I presume, to that which is, to know the condition of that which is?" "Yes." "But opinion, we say, opines." "Yes." "Does it opine the same thing that science knows, and will the Thought, p. 47 "the word δόξα may be used in this neutral, psychological sense; it may be taken unfavourably to denote mere opinion as opposed to knowledge, or favourably when true opinions and beliefs are set in antithesis to the appetites and instincts."

knowable and the opinable be identical, or is that impossible?" "Impossible by our admissions,^a" he said. "If different faculties are naturally related to different objects and both opinion and science are faculties, but each different from the other, as we say—these admissions do not leave place for the identity of the knowable and the opinable.^b" "Then, if that which is knowable, something other than that which is would be the opinable." "Something else." "Does it opine that which is not,^c or is it impossible even to opine that which is not? Reflect: Does not he who opines bring his opinion to bear upon something or shall we reverse ourselves and say that it is possible to opine, yet opine nothing?" "That is impossible." "Then he who opines opines some one thing?" "Yes." "But surely that which is not could not be designated as some one thing, but most rightly as nothing at all." "Yes." "To that which is not we of necessity assigned nescience, and to that which is, knowledge." "Rightly," he said. "Then neither that which is nor that which is not is the object of opinion." "It seems not." "Then opinion would be neither nescience nor knowledge." "So it seems." "Is it then a faculty outside of these, exceeding either knowledge in lucidity or ignorance in obscurity?" "It is neither." "But do you deem opinion something darker than knowledge but brighter than ignorance?" "Much so," he said. "And does it lie within the boundaries of the two?" "Yes." "Then opinion would be between the two." "Most assuredly." "Were we not saying a little while ago^d that if anything should not sometimes appear ugly-and-base ^a? And of the just things, that will not seem unjust? And of the pious things, that will not seem impious? "No, it is inevitable," he said, "that they would appear to be both beautiful in a way and ugly, and so with all the other things you asked about." "And again, do the many double things ^b appear any the less halves than doubles?" "None the less." "And likewise of the great and the small things, the light and the heavy things—will they admit these predicates any more than their opposites?" "No," he said, "each of them will always hold of, partake of, both." "Then is each of these multiples rather than it is not that which one affirms it to be?" "They are like those jesters who palter with us in a double sense at banquets," he replied, "and resemble the children's riddle ^c about the eunuch and his hitting of the bat—with what and as it sat on what they signify that he struck it. For these things too equivocate, and it is impossible to conceive firmly ^d any one of them to be or not to be or both or neither." "Do you know what to do with them, then?" said I, "and can you find a better place to put them than that midway

* Plato consciously uses mere logic to lend the emphasis and dignity of absolute metaphysics to his distinction between the two types of mind, which is for all practical purposes his main point here. If you cannot correctly define the beautiful, all your imperfect definitions will be refuted by showing that they sometimes describe what is ugly. Cf. Hippias Major 289 c and note on Rep. i. 333 E. The many concrete objects are this and are not that, and so with conscious use of the ambiguity of the copula may be said to tumble about between being and not-being. That this is the consciously intended meaning may be inferred from the fact that in Tim. 37 E, where Plato must have had in mind the conclusions of the Sophist, he still avails himself of this ambiguity to suggest an absolute being behind phenomena. Cf. Unity of Plato's Thought, pp. 55, 56, 60, De Platonis Idearum doctrina, pp. 48, 49. ^b Cf. on 524 A, B.

^b A further thought is developed here, suggested in 479 A, B. Just as the many particular horses, trees or tables shift and change, and are and are not in comparison with the unchanging idea of each, so the many opinions of the multitude about justice and the good and the beautiful and other moral conceptions change, and both are and are not in comparison with the unalterable ideas of justice and beauty, which the philosopher more nearly apprehends. Thus, for the purposes of this contrast, notions, opinions, and what English usage would call ideas, fall into the same class as material objects. between existence or essence and the not-to-be? For we shall surely not discover a darker region than not-being^a that they should still more not be, nor a brighter than being that they should still more be." "Most true," he said. "We would seem to have found, then, that the many conventions^b of the many about the fair and honourable and other things are tumbled about in^c the mid-region between that which is not and that which is in the true and absolute sense." "We have so found it." "But we agreed in advance that, if anything of that sort should be discovered, it must be denominated opinable, not knowable, the wanderer between being caught by the faculty that is betwixt and between." "We did." "We shall affirm, then, that those who view many beautiful things but do not see the beautiful itself and are unable to follow another's guidance^d to it, and many just things, but not justice itself, and so in all cases—we shall say that such men have opinions about all things, but know nothing of the things they opine." "Of necessity." "And, on the other hand, what of those who contemplate the very things themselves in each case, ever remaining the same and unchanged—shall we not say that they know and do not merely opine?" "That, too, necessarily follows." "Shall we not also say that the one welcomes to his thought and loves the things subject practical truth of this distinction is unaffected by our metaphysics. Plato is speaking of what he elsewhere calls the εἰδωλα of justice, beauty and the like. to knowledge and the other those to opinion? Do we not remember that we said that those loved and regarded tones and beautiful colours and the like, but they could not endure the notion of the reality of the beautiful itself?" "We do remember." "Shall we then offend their ears if we call them doxophilists^a rather than philosophers and will they be very angry if we so speak?" "Not if they heed my counsel," he said, "for to be angry with truth is not lawful." "Then to those who in each and every kind welcome the true being, lovers of wisdom and not lovers of opinion^b is the name we must give." "By all means."

^b Isoc. xv. 271 is conceivably an answer to this.
